Soviet Offer On Missiles

WASHINGTON - The White House rejected on Thursday a Kremlin proposal that the two countries should reduce their landbased long-range missiles before Ronald Reagan and Mikhail S. Gorbachev meet in Geneva next

Administration officials said the plan called on the Soviet Union and the United States to reduce their nuclear arsenals by 200 to 300 missiles each as a sign of good faith in arms control negotiations.

Larry Speakes, the White House spokesman, said that the latest Soviet proposal on missiles "would not meet our criteria of stability.

balance and equity."

The proposal, Mr. Speakes said, would entail relatively fewer warhead reductions by the Soviet Union. The ratio of warheads to targets would move further to Moscow's advantage, and its first-strike capability would be enhanced.

The Soviet Union's main strength is in land-based missiles. The U.S. relies more on submarinebased missiles and bombers.

U.S. officials said the plan would enable Moscow to eliminate 200 or 300 of its oldest and least effective missiles. But the United States would have to cut its Minuteman missile force, the backbone of its land-based nuclear deterrent.

The U.S. proposal calls for a limit on European-based intermediate-range ballistic missiles of 140 launchers on each side, with a warhead limit of about 420 to 450 on each side. The Soviet side would be expect-had agreed to the accord on chemical weapons and that the administration had agreed in principle, although they said the Pentagon was continuing to resist giving its final approval. Details on how to put the accord into effect have not been worked out, they said. Officials said the agreement on chemical weapons was one of several arms-control statements the two sides have prepared for announcement at the end of the meetings next week between President Ronald Reagan and Mikhail S. Gorbachev, the Soviet leader. But administration officials acknowledged that unless there was a major breakthrough on arms control, these measures would not be sufficient by themselves for Mr. Reagan to be able to portray the meeting as a major success.

Because of what they said were continuing uncertainties about reaching an agreement on offensive and defensive nuclear forces, most administration officials continued to play down prospects for breakthroughs in Geneva.

Administration officials familiar with summit meetings noted that statements tilting back and forth from optimism to pessimism were not unusual before high-level meetings. Presidents and their advisers use statements about expectations as part of the bargaining process and as a way of shaping opinion about the results. The disclosure of an agreement on chemical weapons comes when the United States and the Soviet Union have been negotiating in Geneva to destroy existing stockpiles and cease further production. as distinguished from preventing their spread to other countries. The two sides have been unable to reach such an accord. The administration has said Soviet troops have used chemical weapons in Afghanistan, and both sides have expressed concerns about Irag's use of chemical weapons against Iran.

The use of chemical weapons in warfare is banned by the Geneva Protocol of 1925, but there are no restrictions on production and stockpiling.

Mr. Gorbachev, in a visit to Paris last month, advanced what he called the "thought" that the two sides could work on an agreement on halting the spread of chemical weapons as they had developed a

Reagan Hoping Dialogue Will Modify Gorbachev's View of U.S.

By Bernard Weinraub New York Times Service

WASHINGTON - President Ronald Reagan believes he will have a significant effect on Mikhail S. Gorbachev's views of the United States through his "personal dia-logue" with the Soviet leader at the summit meeting next week, a U.S.

The official said Wednesday that Mr. Reagan and White House aides believed that results in arms control and reducing regional tensions between the superpowers would be seen in the months after the meeting and not at the meeting itself Tuesday and Wednesday.

"The president very much wants to get at, or to establish, a basic understanding in the mind of the general secretary of what our concerns are," the official said. "Why do we worry about the Soviet program, which of their systems pose the biggest problems, our concept of deterrence and how it can be made more stable."

The official also said Mr. Reagan would seek to discuss the administration's space-based shield against missiles and to convince the Soviet leader "why it is clearly not a visionary whim or a political stunt." The research program has emerged as a central issue on the summit meeting's agenda. In Moscow, Mr. Gorbachev reaffirmed that the Strategic Defense Initia-tive would be his main concern at the summit meeting. In a statement to a delegation of

U.S. Intelligence Panel Criticizes CIA

WASHINGTON (WP) — Senator David F. Durenberger, a Republican of Minnesota who is chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence. has criticized the Central Intelligence Agency and its director, William J. Casey, for lacking a "sense of direction" and particularly for failure to understand the Soviet Union.

Mr. Durenberger said Wednesday his committee would consider recommending legislation that would substantially downgrade the CIA director's role and make the president's national security affairs adviser responsible for evaluating intelligence in the policy-making process. Despite his criticisms, Mr. Durenberger also defended Mr. Casey as a "professional" and "a darn good guy in that job."

Mr. Durenberger acknowledged, however, that a vote Thursday in his Republican-dominated committee over whether to recommend Mr. Casey's dismissal after the CIA's handling of the Soviet defector Vitaly Yurchenko would be 8-7 in support of the director, a vote reflecting party lines. Guerrillas Turn to Abductions and Organizing Workers

By Robert J. McCartney Washington Part Service
EL ZAPOTE, El Salvador

Plans to merge El Salvador's five guerrilla forces signal a shift to-ward tougher tactics such as kidnappines and increased efforts to build a mass base of workers and peasants, rebel leaders say.

The country's revolutionary movement has suffered since its èarliest days from ideological divisions that sometimes have resulted in particularly brutal killings.

Now on the defensive militarily and politically, the guerrillas are seeking to put aside past disputes and form a more united front. Leonel González, the leader of one of the groups, said, "We've been able to carry out commando operations that have had a great political importance," owing in part to the unity agreements.

The principal split within the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, the umbrella organization known by its Spanish initials FMLN, is both geographical and ideological. Described simply, it is between the military-oriented guerrillas based in the eastern part of El Salvador and the rebels based here in the north who have shown greater interest in political organiz At a meeting of the FMLN's general command in Perquin in July, there appears to have been a for hard-line tactics such as kidnapping mayors, and they agreed in return to focus more on political work designed to broaden the guer-

It remains to be seen how much success the guerrillas will have in forging "one single army," as the general command said it had agreed to do. Guerrillas of each of the five forces still live in separate camps or in distinct areas in shared

In addition, the new emphasis on kidnappings and urban commando operations, such as the killing of four U.S. marines and eight Salvadoran civilians at a sidewalk resfurther the guerrillas' alliance with such exiled social democratic poliricians as Guillermo Ungo and Ruben Zamora.

The fundamental division in the FMLN is between its two largest groups, the Popular Liberation Forces, based here in Chalatenango province, and the People's Revolutionary Army, based in the northeastern province of Morazán.

The differences between the two are evident in their relations with civilians in their "zones of control," and in the concerns and personalities of their leaders.

It has become possible only in the past four months for a U.S. journalist to make that assessment, because the guerrilla leaders did not begin to meet with U.S. reporters until July.

The Popular Liberation Forces, formed in 1970 by a breakaway faction of the Salvadoran Communist Party, has worked to build a mass base of civilian supporters. Peasants living near El Zapote enthusiastically support the guerril-las, and little or no tension is apparent when armed rebels arrive at

In contrast, relations between the People's Revolutionary Army and civilians living in areas that it dominates in the east appear to be incomfortable.

One reason for the difference in relations with civilians was the People's Revolutionary Army's attempt to force peasants to join its ranks last year. Mr. González, the People's Liberation Forces commander, was soft-spoken and reserved when he spoke in El Zapote on Oct. 29. He repeatedly emphasized the point that "this war is both political and Joaquin Villalobos, right, commander of the rebel People's Liberation Army, talking with guerrillas in Perquin.

Since the Perquin meeting, the FMLN's five forces have cooperated more closely in drawing up military and political plans, guerrilla leaders said. The most visible effect was that the Popular Liberation Forces began on Sept. 18 to kidnap mayors of towns in areas either inside or bordering its "zones of control. There have been other signs of a shift to tougher tactics. In particular, a commando unit kidnapped President José Napoleón Duarte's daughter on Sept. 10. Also, guerrillas seem to have become more willing than in the past to open fire on buses or trucks during nationwide transportation halts called by the guerrillas to disrupt the economy, The rebels freed Mr. Duarte's

PHILADELPHIA - Police Commissioner Gregore J. Sambor, who directed the aerial bombing against a radical group last May that led to 11 deaths and the destruction of 61 homes by fire, has resigned, effective Nov. 30.

The commissioner's resignation Wednesday was the latest political development to reverberate across Philadelphia since the police attempted on May 13 to evict armed members of the radical group MOVE from the house they had fortified in West Philadelphia. It was among the worst fires in the ity's history.

Mr. Sambor was the second to resign among four top city officials who played key roles in the MOVE

The former managing director, Leo A. Brooks, who was in overall command of the MOVE operation, resigned a few days after the bombing and fire.

Mayor W. Wilson Goode and Eire Commissioner William C. Richmond remain in office, and the future of both is widely seen as being in doubt.

The police commissioner's resignation came less than a week after the end of the public hearings in which his actions were portrayed by members of the investigative commission as hasty and ill-considered. He testified that he had been unaware of much that was going on in the assault on the house occupied by MOVE members.

MANILA — After nearly two weeks of debate and political maneuvering, the nature and even the likelihood of early elections called for by President Ferdinand E. Marcos have become fragmented into an array of political and procedural questions.

One of the foremost of these questions is whether this atmosphere of uncertainty and disarray proves the political mastery of Mr. Marcos or reflects the desperate maneuvers of a president under pressure from several directions.

Some political analysts suggest that both explanations may be partly true.

The deterioration of the political, economic and military situa-tion in the Philippines over the past two years, and a new level of concerted pressure from Washington in recent weeks, may have brought a more precipitate reaction from Mr. Marcos than might have been seen in the past.

Salvador H. Laurel, a former senator and one of Mr. Marcos's. chief potential opponents in an election, appears to be of this opinsystem to ensure fair elections remain a source of controversy.

The questions are divisive ones between the president and his opposition, and within the two camps themselves, and together they raise the question of whether elections will be held at all.

Some factions of the opposition, particularly the supporters of Mr. Laurel's chief rival for the nomination, Corazon Aquino, say they will insist on a favorable resolution of some of these questions if they are to contest the election. Mrs. Aquino is the widow of the assassinated opposition leader Benigno S.

Some politicians in Mr. Marcos's circle say they believe he has deliberately constructed these points of conflict to have the option of calland time to be shifting ground on ing off the election and blaming his opponents' intransigence.

Opinion is divided among Philippine commentators over whether the Americans pressured Mr. Marcos into holding early elections, or whether the announcement of an but the date of the vote is still election was a ploy to blunt in-creasingly insistent U.S. demands for more wide-reaching reforms.

Marcos had proposed for Jan. 17. Mr. Marcos's political affairs adviser, Leonardo B. Perez, said that an eight-hour bargaining session had failed to produce agreement between the president's New Society Movement and opposition assemblymen on a new election date.

"We merely agreed to be flexible on the date," Mr. Perez said, "but it should not be later than the first week of February." He added that negotiations were continuing on whether the election should include the vacant post of vice president.

In announcing the election last week, Mr. Marcos said he wanted only the presidency to be at stake but later agreed to include the vice Jaime Ferrer, an opposition assemblyman who confirmed the postponement, said that the government party had "asked us if we would agree not to include the vice presidency and we said 'no.' Salvador H. Laurel, an opposition leader and possible presidential candidate, pledged that Mr. Marcos's opponents would rally behind a single candidate.

Mr. Laurel declined to indicate if he would be willing to yield his candidacy in favor of Corazon Aquino, widow of the assassinated opposition leader Benigno S. Aquino Jr.

"I don't think Cory and I will have a problem agreeing," he said. Meanwhile, the National Assembly adopted an elections bill that would ease some restrictions, but it contains elements opposed by Mr. Marcos's critics.

The bill allows district and village officials, whom the opposition says are loyal to Mr. Marcos, to serve as poll watchers.

It also authorizes the Commission on Elections to exclude the National Movement for Free Elections, a group of businessmen and civic workers that claims to be free of government influence, from monitoring election results.

The U.S. House of Representatives on Thursday approved, 417-0, a resolution calling on Mr. Marcos to ensure that the presidential elections are free and fair. The Associated Press reported from Washington. An identical measure is

Good Start for Guatemala

Guatemala's much awaited "democratic opening" turns out to be just that. Round one of its presidential elections was conducted fairly on Nov. 3, apparently without the gross abuses that had marred most recent contests. A runoff between two civilians will be held Dec. 8. With the army's indulgence, Guatemala's first freely elected president in 15 years will take office in January.

 Guatemala has been dominated by a succession of military and extreme right-wing regimes for 31 years - ever since a CIA-orgamized coup that toppled the left-leaning elected government of Jacobo Arbenz. The army has waged a generally successful campaign against left-wing guerrillas, leaving 100,000 Guatemalans, mostly civilians, dead.

Terror and counterterror against the country's Indian majority have uprooted villages and created tens of thousands of refugees. The battle has militarized the entire society, prompting the draft of all adult males below age 60 for the 900,000-man "civil patrol." Rightist death squads have wiped out or intimidated most political centrists. Can a civilian now bring peace to Central America's most developed country? Will the military submit to constitutional processes?

Neither Marco Vinicio Cerezo, a Christian Democrat who polled 39 percent of the vote, nor Jorge Carpio Nicolle, his right-leaning challenger who polled 20 percent, has dared to talk about bringing the military under control. But a severe economic crisis has caused the country's business community to long for more honest and efficient civilian government. It also wants a better reputation among foreign lenders and aid givers.

During the Carter years Guatemala was prosperous enough to refuse military aid rather than accept human rights lectures. It can no longer afford such bravado. The Reagan administration last year succeeded in persuading Congress to renew military aid, and it now seeks more aid as part of its regional counterterrorism program. To that end it is pressing the Guatemalan military to curb its excesses and to let civilians really rule. That is likely to be a long, hard struggle, but it is well begun. - THE NEW YORK TIMES.

Managing Exchange Rates

Do not blame imports, or the people who buy them, for the gigantic American trade deficits. The trouble lies in the currency exchange rates, and a more useful approach is to ask why the exchange markets have been behaving so strangely in the past several years. This week a congressional conference on exchange rates, convened at the initiative of Representative Jack Kemp of New York and Senator Bill Bradley of New Jersey, has been at work on that question. Most of Congress now has acknowledged, publicly or otherwise, that protectionism — the attempt to restrict imports by law - is dangerous and costly in its effects. But if protectionism will not work, the politicians anxiously ask, what will?

The kind of reform that is needed has less to do with changing the exchange system than with changing the attitudes and political preconceptions that surround it. From World War II until the 1970s, Americans lived in a world in which exchange rates were something for other countries to worry about. The rest of the world made little difference to the hugely powerful U.S. economy, most Americans thought, and they were right — for a while. But beginning in the early 1970s, America's foreign trade expanded twice as fast as its economy. and the flows of foreign investment expanded even faster. Although foreign trade and foreign money became major determinants of American prosperity, American views of the world did not adjust immediately to that reali-ty. Until recently the Reagan administration brushed off the foreign connections with the argument that, with steady growth at home, the international accounts would take care of themselves. That has not worked.

As long as the United States runs large budget deficits requiring foreign financing, the dollar exchange rates will continue to be out of line. All of the trading countries draw great advantages from the enormous volumes of trade that tie their economies together. But because they are tied together their governments enjoy less independence in economic policy than they once did. The Americans in particular are having trouble getting used to these constraints and the obligations to cooperation that they impose.

But responsibility for poor performance does not lie wholly with the United States. West Germany and Japan still are not entirely accustomed to their economic weight, and behave as though their policies had little effect on anyone else. As long as such strong countries accept so little responsibility for making the system work, it is not likely to work well.

No one country now dominates exchange rates, and managing them is a joint endeavor. That is the spirit in which the Kemp-Bradley conference is proceeding, and that is why it may prove to be unusually useful.

Killed for Being an Arab

In the same week that Leon Klinghoffer was murdered in the Mediterranean for the crime of being Jewish. Alex Odeh was murdered in California for the crime of being an Arab. Mr. Odeh, a Palestinian by birth, was killed by a bomb on Oct. 11 when he opened his office door in Santa Ana, where he was West Coast director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee. On television the day before, while condemning the Achille Lauro hijacking, he had defended Yasser Arafat.

The Odeh murder was denounced immedi ately by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith as "domestic terrorism which cannot be tolerated." A disturbingly different judgment was offered by Irv Rubin, chairman of the Jewish Defense League: "I have no tears for Mr. Odeh. He got exactly what he deserved." Despite these words, the league denies any part in the crime and indignantly rejects as slander the FBI's preliminary finding that it is "the possible responsible group." It will take a trial to determine who killed Mr. Odeh.

No trial is needed to ascertain the character of the Jewish Defense League, a promoter of blatant racism in America and Israel. Mr. Rubin was named U.S. chairman by the league's founder, Rabbi Meir Kahane, who immigrated to Israel and now sits in its parliament as the choice of 1.2 percent of the voters. Rabbi Kahane derides Arabs as "dogs" and "jackals" and says they must be driven from Israel with "their luggage of abomination." In a sordid, unintended parody of Nazi ideology, he advocates making Israel ethnically pure.

To defend its democracy against racism, Israel is changing its laws to try to disqualify Mr. Kahane's party. But the Jewish Defense League also poses a moral and political problem for America. A life is a life, and there can be no distinction between the murder of a Jew by the Palestine Liberation Organization and the murder of an Arab to punish the PLO.

When Mr. Rubin condones the killing of Mr. Odeh, he dishonors the memory of Mr. Klinghoffer. Anti-Semitism is odious whether practiced against Jew or Arab. The way to drive that message home is to bring Mr. Odeh's killers to justice.

A Soviet Setback on Afghanistan

The Soviet Union has suffered a diplomatic setback with the adoption [Wednesday] of a UN resolution demanding "the immediate withdrawal of all foreign forces from Afghanistan." For the Russians, the vote is all the more inopportune coming just before the Reagan-Gorbachev summit conference - and because the resolution recommends a solution based on the "political independence and nonaligned nature" of Afghanistan, the self-determination of its people without foreign interference and the right of Afghan refugees to return home.

Washington, while furnishing arms to the Afghan rebels, has not provided the missiles that would wreak havor on Soviet aircraft. The U.S. aim seems to be to keep pressure on Moscow to negotiate. We will know after the Geneva meeting whether Mr. Gorbachev hears this language better than did his predecessors. - Le Monde (Paris).

1910: China Chafes at Opium Pact

PEKING - The leaders of the National Assembly have determined to induce Great Britain to consent to an abrogation of the ten-year agreement under which China is not permitted to prohibit the importation of Indian opium. In view of the fact that China has already reduced home-grown opium to a small fraction, not exceeding ten percent of the former total, the promoters of the movement believe that England should consent to an absolute prohibition of the importation from India. The Anti-Opium League cabled the British and American Societies [on Nov. 14] asking for active cooperation in securing a change of attitude on the part of the British government. The present attitude, they contend, is the one obstacle to the success of China's sincere efforts to stamp out the opium evil.

1935: Europeans Investing in America WASHINGTON - Joseph P. Kennedy, retiring chairman of the Securities Exchange Commission, conferred [on Nov. 14] with President Franklin D. Roosevelt regarding the European nervousness that is causing a flow of capital to Wall Street, Kennedy foresaw a situation wherein the sudden withdrawal of this capital might cause a sharp break in the market.
"That's purely hypothetical," he said. "If they decide conditions abroad warrant bringing back their gold you might have a situation where withdrawals would bring a severe break." Kennedy auributed much of the recent rise in foreign buying power to "England, while France and other nations on the Continent are now beginning to swing toward America. The results will be a terrific increase in the stock market business of this country,"

Too Much Arms Talk Can Spoil a Summit

W ASHINGTON — The summit meeting be-tween Ronald Reagan and Mikhail S. Gorbachev provides an opportunity for both super-powers to begin to put their relations on a firmer footing. If they are to do this, however, they must digest the lessons of the past.

It would be unrealistic to expect a breakthrough on arms control in Geneva: The time is too short and the two sides' positions are too far apart. In addition, the Reagan administration remains too divided and unsure of what it wants. The most the meeting can do is to help define the major areas on which the two sides should focus in the next phase of arms control negotiations and thus give those talks new impetus. If the summit meeting is to serve more significant purpose, it must look beyond the immediate disagreements on arms control and focus on the broader problems of the political relationship. This is not to argue that arms control is not important. There is, however, a danger in making it the centerpiece of America's relationship with the Soviet Union. This was one problem with the approach pursued by President Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger in the early 1970s.

That approach had several weaknesses. First, by focusing almost exclusively on arms control, it was made to bear the whole burden of the relationship. When arms control talks stalled, the political relationship suffered. Second, the approach at times led the United States to make otherwise undesirable compromises on arms control in order to maintain the momentum in political relations. Third, it tied arms control too closely to the vicissitudes of political relations. When these relations deteriorated, support for arms control fell.

The fate of the second strategic arms limitation accord illustrates this; it was detailed more by Soviet behavior in the Third World than by any inherent weakness in the accord. In this sense, President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser. Zbigniew Brzezinski, was right when he quipped that the SALT-2 treaty lay "buried in the sands of the Ogaden."

Two lessons flow from this. First, arms control cannot be pursued in a vacuum. It must be part of a larger political process designed to stabilize relations between Washington and Moscow, Without a broader political accommodation, arms control is likely to stagnate - as the dismal record of the last six years underscores.

Second, the arms control dialogue needs to be broadened beyond arms reductions to include other subjects that can help stabilize military relationships. One area worth exploring would be discussions between the military establishments in both countries on such issues as nuclear doctrine and force structure. The object of such talks would not be arms reductions but rather a better understanding of the other side's perceptions of the military ance in all its various aspects. In particular such talks could focus on ways in which force structures might be changed to enhance stability.

These discussions could be complemented by talks on confidence-building measures designed to reduce the risk of war by accident, miscalculation and misperception. The United States and the Soviet Union have been implementing such measures since the 1960s—including the 1963 hot-line agreement, the 1971 agreement on reducing the risk of nuclear war and the 1973 agreement on the prevention of nuclear war.

Such measures are, of course, no substitute for arms reduction. But they can help stabilize relations in important ways. They also help to keep the arms control dialogue going while both sides grap-ple with the larger and harder strategic issues, thus preventing a deadlock. This is particularly impor-tant because, as a result of changes in technology, comprehensive arms control agreements like the first and second strategic arms limitation treaties are becoming increasingly hard to negotiate.

In short, the summit meeting must be the first step in a larger process of stabilizing relations across the board. Otherwise, the prospects for progress in arms control are likely to stay dim.

OSTON - The Reagan-Gorbachev summit meeting comes at the right time - a time when there is a real chance, the best in years, to improve relations between the two superpowers. That is the logic of the issues, of national interest and of the two leaders' political interests.

Consider the central issue on the agenda, the attempt to limit nuclear arms. The problem is complex, and sharp differences remain between the Soviet and U.S. positions. But in recent weeks the two sides have made. what amounts to a dramatic, though largely unacknowledged, breakthrough on a fundamental principle,

The principle is that the vast armories of offensive nuclear weapons should be cut by 50 percent. Massive reductions of that kind have been President Reagan's dream since he took office. The Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, made a 50-percent cut his proposal last month. Of course, the two sides differ on how to count weapons, on exactly which ones should be cut. A summit meeting cannot solve those details. But it can make explicit the agreement on principle — the 50-percent principle — and instruct negotiators to proceed on that basis. Such an agreement should be attainable. It would be a significant achievement.

Not even the problem that seems most forbidding, Mr. Reagan's "stari wars" program, should stand in the way of an agreement on arms control. principles at the Geneva meeting. From some of the statements made on both sides, negotiators could fash-ion a solution sufficient for the day: reaffirming the anti-ballistic missile treaty while allowing "star wars" research to proceed.

The realistic reasons for hope in Geneva make one wonder about the noises coming out of the Resgan administration in advance of the meeting. Various officials have been putting on longer and longer faces; suggesting that not much will be achieved. It is as if they were playing a game of lowered expectations.

Secretary of State George Shultz' and the pres ident's national security adviser, Robert McFarlane, met Mr. Gorbachev last week to prepare for the summit talks. On their return to Washington, the word went out that Mr. Gorbachev had been so "argumentative" that the chances for progress in Geneva looked dim.

Mr. Reagan's strength is as an articulator of visions. And it is just there that a summit conference can America? He is not crazy.

A few more Medvids and the old joke — definition of a Soviet trio; a can summit meeting sends out, if it work, that it can make a difference. works, is that two very different and antagonistic societies must have at least a degree of mutual respect for the sake of survival. To his credit, Mr.

Reagan has understood that. As a matter of history, Ronald Reagan has a great interest in a successful summit meeting, one that leads to real moderation of the arms race. It would give meaning to a presidency whose main achievement so far — changing domestic priorities is running aground on economic shoals. It would reassure European allies uneasy about a new arms race.

INDONESIA: A Importer of Rice Becomes a Potential Exporter

JAKARTA- An archipelago consists of 13.700 islands on the equator. Indonesia has long been a net importer of food, especially rice the main staple of the majority of the country's 167 million people.

Rice imports amounted at 628 thousand tonnes in 1968, increased to 955 thousand tonnes in 1970 and reached a peak in 1980 at about 2 million tonnes.

This does not mean that rice production stagnated. But, just as Robert Malthus predicted, the increase in production could not match the increase in demand that came with population growth and higher income. About 12.2 million tonnes of milled rice were produced in 1969. In 1984, after fifteen year's hardwork and determination, the production of milled rice reached 25.8 million tonnes.

During the 20 year period, 1963-1983, Indonesia received about US$187 million worth of food aid --- accepted worldwide as part of development aid.

The New Order of the Indonesian priorities. government, under President Suharto's leadership, was well aware of both its benefits and hazards for the recipient country. Food aid can prevent starvation and helps a country overcome short-term stock deficits. It can also be used meaningfully in finding innovative ways to promote development and alleviate poverty and malnutrition. But, there is also the danger to become dependent on the donations. In order not to disturb the normal patterns of production and marketing, excess aid was channelled through a special agency which stabilizes the prices of food produced domesti-

Four main programs were included in the drive towards self sufficiency: intensification, extensification, rehabilitation, and diversification. Of these four programs, intensification has played the leading role. The main reason for this is the confidence that people had that intensification was the cheapest and most effective approach.

On the average, an Indonesian farmer will own one hectare of land. On Java, the most densely populated island, the average is only 0.6 hectare per farmer.

Indonesian small farmers are willing to adapt to new innovations. For example, the use of rice hullers in rural areas was very low in 1968. There were only about 8.000 units at that time, for most farmers still believe in the old traditional way of hulling rice. By 1983, the number of hullers in use climbed to 64.000. Other examples can also be seen in the increases in use of fertilizer, high yielding varieties and modern equipments such as tractors, hand sprayers. thresher and the like.

But, the most rewarding aspect of this intensification program must be attributed to the system called Mass Demonstration, which then turned to Mass Guidance Program. At first, the small farmers were organized into groups, consists of up to 25 farmers. One is selected as the leader of the group, who is accountable to bring the problem of his members to the notice of the organizers.

Demonstration plots of 0.1 ha are established on the farmer's land. This is then developed further into a demonstration farm between 5 and 10 ha, utilizing modern technology, managed by 10-15 farmers in the group. Once these farms have shown significant production increases, the area is broadened out to 25-100 ha and organized cooperatively among several groups.

In two years, 1966 - 1967, the area under this intensification program increased from 172.000 ha to more than 1.1 million ha. These numbers have been continually increasing. Last year, the program has covered 9.6 million

By the cooperation pattern, the small farmers are able to see that modern technology can operate effectively at the village level. It is this system that has worked so effectively in rice production, yielding 25.8 million tonnes in ion photographers would rather be something else. In his preface to the catalog to the exhibition of fashion photographs now in the Victoria and Albert Museum, the museum's director, Sir Roy Strong, speaks of the photographers love-hate relationship to their craft and claims they "feel guilt-ridden from time to very elegant women taking the grit out of their eyes, or blowing their noses, or taking the lipstick off their teeth." Beaton was of course far too wise to do such a thing.

Edward Steichen, whose 1927 photograph of Marion Morehouse in a Cheruit dress has been called "the key to modern fashion pho-tography," said what he liked especially about Morehouse (who became Mrs. c. c. cummings) was that "she was no more interested in fashion than I was."

David Bailey, on the other hand, isn't convinced by all this self-loathing. "Steichen couldn't have been that ambayrassed shout couldn't have been that embarrassed about fashion photography — he spent thirty years doing it. It's like Tolstoy becoming a vege-

Bailey chose the 175 photographs in the V&A show, which is the first major exhibition of fashion photography ever held in Britain. He reckons that he spends only about 10 percent of his time on fashion pictures, but he is not about to put down the craft: "My fashion pictures are documents just as much as my boat people or my pictures for Bandaid of Sudan."

The work of some of the best fashion photographers, Bailey says, could qualify for categories other than fashion. "Irving Penn, still life. Richard Avedon, portraits. And Bill Klein has had enormous influence on reportage."

Bailey himself has had an influence not only on fashion pictures but on pop sociology. He brought cockney cheek and hustle to the genteel purlicus of Harper's Bazaar and Vogue and helped create the swinging '60s although he was too canny to be taken in entirely by the myth. The sixties was 3,000 people in London. I don't think the coal miner in Yorkshire had much fon in the

in his own preface for the V&A show (which lasts through mid-January) Bailey quotes the line, "When I die I want to go to Vogue." This still and glossy paradise is represented by 39 photographers who range alphabetically from Diane Arbus, who photographed children's fashions in a style eetily like her more famous work, to Bruce Weber, born in 1946 and the hottest photographer these days. "With Weber and Helmut Newton we're talking more about style than fashion," Bailey says. "Fashion is here six months and gone. You can recognize a

In addition to such expected grandees as Baron Adolphe de Meyer, whom Beaton called the Debussy of photographers, there are many now-obscure names such as the Frenchman Jean Moral, the Czech François Kollar, the Swiss Hans Feurer, the American Melvin Sokolsky, and above all the very influential Martin Munkaesi, a Hungarian who died in 1963 and whom Henri Cartier-

Bresson called one of photography's most important pioneers who "made me suddenly realize that photography could reach eternity through the moment."

A former sports photographer, Munkasci brought movement to fashion photography and actually had a model run toward the camera. Richard Avedon had said that Munkasci's pictures in Harper's Bazaar were his first lesson in photography.

In Avedon's own pictures, the running models seem frozen in mid-air. Both Avedon's elaborate set-ups and the monumental photgraphs of Irving Penn (so intense, com-plained one Vogue editor, that they burned the pages and could not be used) date from the days of great dresses, which raises the question of how much the fading of haute conture hastened the disappearance of the grandiose fashion photograph.

Bailey points out that haute countre died in the '60s at just about the time that the changed. "The dress was a sculptured thing before," he says. As for fashion photography, "Almost anyone can do it now."

Bailey's own favorite fashion photographer is Cecil Beaton. "He had a way of making people happy in their own space. He had a way of making people natural."

Yet no photographs were more posed and unnatural than Beaton's. "All pictures are unnatural," Bailey replies. "All pictures are sad because they're about dead people. Paintings you don't think of in a special time or with a specific event. With photos I always think I'm looking at something dead."

AILEY just contributed 35 photographs to a Live Aid auction that raised £20,070 (about $28,000) last week at Sotheby's. He also made a commercial for Greenpeace. "It's a girl dragging a fur coat with blood oozing out of it and it says, 'It takes 40 dumb animals to make a fur coat and one to wear it." It is, he says, the first X-rated commercial and can only be shown with X-rated films.

He did a stately portrait of Margaret Thatcher for the current issue of English Vogue and is experimenting with different cameras, having noted some years back that they have different effects on sitters.

People will, he says, react differently to a Rolleiflex or a huge 14x11 camera. "It im-poses something on the sitters. It takes the pictures - you can't move it, you can't lie." He did not use this camera with Mrs. Thatcher.

"I cheated that like a normal Vogue sitting," he says, laughing.

He may do little fashion work these days, but still when he dies David Bailey would like to go to Vogue.

"I wouldn't mind if all the girls were there.

Not the editors," he says. "The models."

German Theater's Bad Boy

by John Curtin

AMBURG - Catcalis, boos and whistling reach a crescendo and threaten to drown out the ap-plause as Peter Zadek walks on stage to join his "bloodstained" actors. They are standing in a sea of stage carnage left in the wake of the West German director's new production of "The Duchess of Malfi," the Jacobean horror classic by John Webster.

During the three-hour-long premiere, the audience of the rich, chic and prominent in the Deutsches Schauspielhaus has witnessed the theatrical equivalent of "The Texas Chain Saw Massacre," spiced with sex, nudity and a bizarre string of anachronisms. Squash, tuxedoes and telephones in a 17th-century play?

It is all par for the course in a Peter Zadek production and Hamburg audiences can expect more of the same. At 59, the West German theater's most enduring enfant terrible has signed on as the new Intendant, or general manager, of the prestigious Schauspielhaus and shows no indication of wanting to mellow into a grand old man. Sitting in his spacious, light-filled office in the newly renovated turn-of-the-century theater opposite the main railroad station, the director seems to relish his role as Skandalmacher. It is one he has enjoyed since 1957, at the latest, when Jean Genet called him "an idiot" for an unconventional London production of his play "The Balcony." Things have not changed much since, after a stint as Intendant at the Bochum Schauspielhaus in the 1970s, Zadek went on to provoke shock, titillate and delight audiences in the country's leading theaters.

A completely nude Desdemona in a 1976

Hamburg production of "Othello" was an attention-getter, as was a 1981 musical review version of "Jeder Stirbt für Sich Allein" (Everyone Dies for Himself). The lightbearted treatment of Hans Fallada's serious novel about the resistance prompted one critic to call the staging politically "ob-

"I suppose I am interested in the place where the taboo sits," says the director, who insists that he doesn't "care a damn" whether the crowd boos or applauds as long as it reacts. Bad reviews bother him even less. "Every sort of vicious attack that you can possibly imagine has been made," he says. almost gleefully.

Many a broadside greeted Zadek's unconventional Shakespeare productions of the 1960s and '70s. The American historian Gordon A. Craig, author of "The Germans," in support of his thesis that the playwright had been "exposed to every outrage" in Germany in recent years, cited Zadek's "Measure for Measure" in Bremen as "an attempt, on the basis of a prose translation of the play that retained nothing of Shakespeare's lan-guage, to tell the audience what the director thought the poet should have said."

"I think the theater is free to treat anvthing in any way whatsoever," declares the director, who defines himself as "neither German, nor English, nor Jewish, Or all three." In 1933, at age 7, he fled with his parents from Berlin to London, where he remained for 25 years. "I'm a sort of gypsy. I don't feel that I belong here or there or anywhere. That gives me a certain freedom of action which is perhaps unusual, particularly in Germany."

Zadek's interest in theater dates from his student days at Jesus College. Oxford, where he was enrolled in modern languages but spent most of his time playing the violin. acting and directing. Like his contemporaries Kenneth Tynan and Peter Brook, he came under the influence of the literature and drama scholar Nevill Coghill. "There was an attitude to Shakespeare which was so free and so full of enthusiasm which we all learned from this man that I think it influenced the theater in England and all over the world much, much more than anybody

After time at the Old Vic school he worked his way through numerous small theaters in England, produced drama for the BBC and finally returned to West Germany in 1959.

Now, as the newly hired head man of the Hamburg Schauspielhaus, one of the German-language theater's leading houses, and recently acclaimed "director of the season" (according to the magazine Theater Heute, which polled 33 West German theater critics) Zadek is at the summit of his career.

Four of his own productions are showing in Hamburg this season including Federico

Garcia Lorca's "Yerma," John Hopkins's

ful version of "Ghetto" by the Israeli author Joshua Sobol. The musical, which portrays a cabaret group struggling to survive in the Nazi-controlled ghetto in Vilna, Lithuania, poses some delicate questions about the ethics of collaboration. It was first given at the Freie Volksbühne in West Berlin, and was chosen in the same critics' poll as one of the high points of the last season.

"Losing Time" and an enormously success-

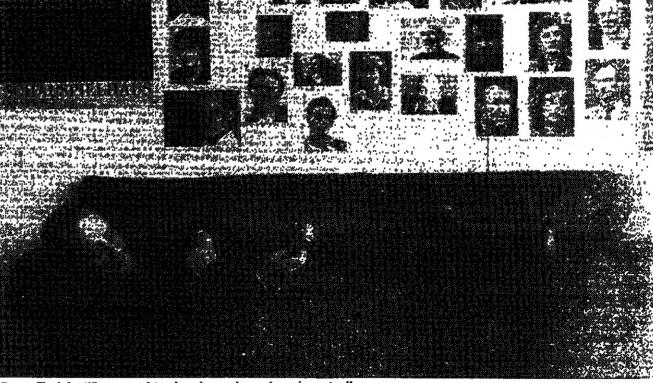

HE work appealed to Zadek because "it was not about Jews as victims. It's about Jews the way they behave today as Israelis. The main character, who is prepared to make compromises with the Ger-mans to save lives, but who is also prepared to behave in a manner which his more liberal or more humanistic friends would describe as cynical, I would compare to the behavior of the Israelis for instance in the raid on Tunis, which I would defend and find absolutely in order."

Contrary to what one might expect from a director whose name is associated with scandal and provocation, Zadek is a shy, retiring man who confesses - in the self-deprecating manner of a perfect Oxonian - that he hasn't "the faintest idea" why he is cut out for his job. All he knows is that he is "quite good at listening, and watching people doing things. I spend most of my time watching what an actor does and how his imagination works. I'm fascinated by the idea of people being able to think themselves into other people or into other worlds."

Although he has made films, Zadek does not feel at home in the cinema. What disturbs him is a shooting schedule with no logical sequence. "If I have to start on page 19 of a script, and then on page 1 the next day, and then do the death scene and after that the birth, I get very confused," he says. Nor does yearn for the English stage or Broadway. What should I do on Broadway? Another bad musical? The theater in England and America is so diabolically bad at the moment, what should I want to do

"I like to work in a country like Germany," he added, "where the theater is important and really central to people's lives."

ARIS - The Paris season, which promises to be rich and varied, started out with a marked American in-filtration of the cultural scene. First came Christo's irreverent and witty wrapping of the Pont Neuf. Then there was the dedication of two public sculptures by Richard Serra, including his 35-foot-tall, 100-ton assemblage, "Slat," at the edge of the highrise business suburb of La Défense.

Now America is a presence on the Paris stage. The dialectic between strength and precariousness which characterizes Serra's elegant steel cube can be detected in the tilted urban landscape that provides the disquieting setting for Woody Allen's "Dieu, Shakespeare et Moi," the reigning boulevard success of the early season. Though these early Allen sketches may not be the authordramatist's best effort, he can do no wrong in Paris. The French admire him as a fringe character, an anti-hero who has made an establishment success out of resolutely going against the grain of his society. The other sold-out triumph in which America looms large is the avant-garde pro-duction of Ariane Mnouchkine's Théâtre du Soleil, lengthily titled "L'Histoire terrible mais inachevée de Norodom Sihanouk, Roi du Cambodge" ("The Terrible but Unfinished Story of Norodom Sihanouk, King of Cambodia"). Hélène Cixous's modern chronicle play, in the tradition of Shakespearean historical drama, has been accorded the bold Oriental treatment that characterized Mnouchkine's productions of "Twelth Night," "Richard II" and "Henry

The eight-hour play, in two parts given over two evenings, is a highly evocative, poetic caricature of a gentle yet wily ruler enmeshed in the power games of the superpowers. Although Cixous, one of the leaders of the feminist movement in France, is well known for her radical politics, she proves to be both moderate and wise in this complex, ambitious satire. Its broad humor may not spare the American giant, but it is no less devastating in its exposure of the schemes of the Russians and the Chinese. If there is any message, it is, "Leave this fragile, ancient culture alone."

"Ariane and I wanted to create a modern regard to Cambodians. It was our intention history play, the story of a whole people's misfortune, of a genocide," Cixous explained after the play's opening. "Ariane traveled widely in the East some 10 years ago to alter this perception. As the play begins, four black-clad men and a woman stand on the edge of the vaste square beechwood stage of the Cartoucherie de Vincennes. They have reached the bank of the Mekong River. Phnom Penh, the capital, lies on the other side, unprotected by the dispirited, corrupt forces of Lon Nol's army. Led by Pol Pot, the Khmer Rouge are close to final victory. However, the victors now face the problem of administering "a crocodile that will tear them to pieces," a city peopled by an urban middle class and the

Australia's Boom in Writing

YDNEY - Most people think of Australians as yachters, surfers, beer-drinkers, more than writers. Yet probably there is more good fiction being written in Australia today than in any other part of the English-speaking world. Not just one or two promising authors, but an avalanche of talent.

In recent years the paperback publishing house Penguin Australia has proved to be more successful than any other Penguin branch worldwide, so it's easy to deduce that Australians are not only prolific writers, but

If you travel around the country today you no longer get the impression of being in some distant and faintly ridiculous outpost of the British Commonwealth. On the con-trary: Anti-Pom sentiments are expressed quite frequently, and the Italians and Greeks are held up as exemplary New Australians.

Immigrants from Southeast Asia may still be writers mostly choose to explore the finer regarded with some reserve by older Austra-lians, but this is bound to change in time as well. The New Australia is a unique ethnical hybrid in a unique geographical position. But the expression of Australianity in fic-tion needed a catalyst, which it found in the Literature Board of the Australia Council. The council deals with public funding for the arts, and the Literature Board was set up in 1973. "Seventy-percent of our subsidies go to hving writers, ranging from the young to the established, to buy time," explains the director of the board. Thomas Shapcott, himself a respected poet and novelist. "This has always been a controversial decision. But we believe that it has allowed writers to do that final revision, that extra polish that makes all the difference."

The yield has been a wide range of writing and poetry. Notably, there has been a sudden increase in the number of women fiction writers writing with great stylistic authority. And the short story has proved to be a details of the small event; they can express with extraordinary verbal economy the more clusive feelings involved in episodes that do not claim to change the course of history, or even to leave a mark on it. There are exceptions, of course, but for the most part Australian fiction is not interested in Heroes and Heroines and Stories that have a beginning, a middle and an end. It focuses rather on chunks of a continuum: like being more drawn by those exquisite miniature landscapes that act as a background in Renaissance portraits than by the figure portrayed. The Australian fiction writers have not only been encouraged by the far-sighted funding policy of the Literature Board. They have also been backed by some courageous publishing ventures. The earliest on the scene was the University of Queensland Press. Until the mid-'60s its best seller was "The Internal Anatomy of the Sheep." Then a young American called Frank Thompson was appointed general manager and things

Los Angeles the Flamboyant

by Charles Lockwood

OS ANGELES - Of the half dozen distinct areas in central Los Angeles, the most historic - and unquestionably the most vibrant -is the old downtown just east of Pershing Square, Spring Street, the former Wall Street of the West, is an open-air museum of early 20th-century commercial architecture. One block west, Broadway is a bustling shopping and theatergoing street for the city's vast Mexican community, and between Third Street and Olympic Boulevard it offers the largest single concentration of pre-World War II movie palaces in America. Parts of both Spring Street and Broadway are listed as historic districts on the National Register of Historic Places.

To explore downtown Los Angeles on foot, start at Broadway and 11th Street. where the flamboyant Mission-style Los Angeles Herald-Examiner Building (1912) rises hoenix-like out of nearby parking lots and drab one-story commercial buildings. Built by William Randolph Hearst, the blockong, white stucco building is a catalog of virtually every Mission-style conceit: blind arches along the sidewalks, Spanish ironwork at the second-floor windows, lowpitched red tile roofs, bell towers at its four corners and a loggia topped by a large dome. To continue your tour, head a block west on 11th Street and turn right on Hill Street. The Belasco Theater (now the Metropolitan Community Church) also embodies the Spanish style. Next door, the Mayan Theater reflects a 1920s vision of pre-Columbian rchitecture with stylized animals and human heads, a row of priests near the roofline and elaborately carved stone blocks, actually poured concrete. Like many downtown Los Angeles theaters, the Mayan's lobby and auditorium have not been modernized

Many of the theaters let visitors look at their lobbies without charge, and a few allow them to wander around, even into roped-off balconies where the views are best. If you are nterested in a particular theater, drop in between shows when the lights are up.

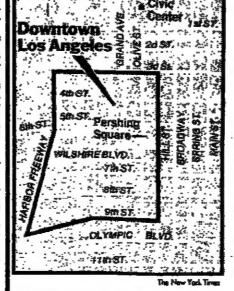

Back on Broadway between Ninth Street and Olympic Boulevard, you can't miss the half-Spanish, half-Gothic former Texaco Theater, whose entrance was recently modernized. Walk past the new ticket booth and the hideous butterscotch tiled walls beneath the marquee. The unaltered lobby resembles the nave of a Spanish church. The auditorium drips with Hispanic-Gothic ornament. Its pièce de résistance is the ceiling's central sunburst surrounded by more ornament and a series of mirrors, which could be spotlighted to cast patterns into the audience.

Why this free-for-all of different architectural styles? The theater owners, like their counterparts across America, hoped that grandiose architecture would attract ticket buyers. Another reason was the prosperity of the motion picture studios that owned many of the theaters before World War II. By 1926 the movies were America's fifth largest industry, producing 90 percent of the world's films. What better way to flaunt the still youthful industry's incredible prosperity?

UT theater owners weren't the only ones to embellish Broadway, which in the '20s and '30s was Southern California's busiest shopping street. At the northwest corner of Ninth Street, the Eastern Columbia Building rises 13 stories to a tower with clocks on each of its four sides. Aside from the dramatic massing and omament, what makes this the finest remaining Art Deco building in Los Angeles is the exciting use of color. The facade is almost entirely covered with blue-green terra cotta tiles, accented with gold bands. The astonishing parade of movie palaces continues along Broadway, offering the visitor almost too many architectural riches to absorb at one time. At 842 South Broadway s the Orpheum, where six brass double doors open into a lobby where the only recent additions are cigarette machines and video games. A few steps north the Tower Theater's virtually unchanged auditorium evokes the lobby of the Paris Opera, scaled down to the theater's 50-by-150-foot lot.

The Tower was the first Los Angeles theater designed by S. Charles Lee, later the architect of several dozen movie houses. "When the Tower was in the planning stages in the early 1920s, the owner insisted that income-producing stores be included in the Broadway and Eight Street facades," Lee said recently. "Two architects said that it couldn't be done, given the cramped site and the need for a 900-seat auditorium, I was 26 at the time, and I told the owner, 'I'll make the plans, and I'll get a building permit, or you will owe me nothing." Just preparing the plans took every cent I had. But the city approved the plans." The Tower was the first Los Angeles theater designed for sound, Lee said. "It opened with the premiere of 'The Jazz Singer.' For months lines stretched around the block because everyone had to experience 'the talkies." he said. A block beyond the Tower Theater, Seventh Street marks the start of Broadway's busiest blocks. From there to Third, the street is a nonstop fiesta, particularly on weekends when families of Mexican descent shop for clothes, see Spanish-language films at the movie palaces or simply stroll. No other part of Los Angeles shows such vitality; it is Manhattan's 14th Street and Times Square rolled into one and imbued with Latin spirit that goes deeper than the Spanish ornamentation on many of the buildings. Few places in downtown Los Angeles more successfully mix the Anglo and the Mexican, past and present, than Chitton's Brookdale Cafeteria at 648 South Broadway. Opened in 1935, Clifton's is the largest public cafeteria in the world measured by sales volume, and it offers a wide-ranging selection of American home-style food from 6 A.M. to 8 or 8:30 P.M. The breakfasts, in particular, are an institution for many downtown shoppers and office workers.

Clifton's retains its exuberant original archi-tecture. Outside, the terrazzo sidewalk depicts classic Southern California scenes. The dining room represents a redwood forest complete with waterfall, rocks and columns that look like trees.

CROSS the street, the Los Angeles Theater was once the finest movie palace in town. The lobby resembles the Hall of Mirrors at Versailles. Near the mezzanine is a fountain where strings of crystal simulate splashing water. The auditorium offers more of the same with Counthian columns, crystal chandeliers, heavy drapery, elaborate plaster work and lots of gold leaf. The basement of the Los Angeles Theater is equally remarkable. There Lee built a restaurant, a ballroom, a 35-by-65-foot oval smoking room, a marble-walled men's room and a ladies' room with 16 toilet stalls, each decorated in a different color of marble. With the help of an engineer, the architect even designed a periscope-like system of mirrors that projected the movie into the ballroom where theatergoers waited for the next show to start.

The Los Angeles Theater was the last movie palace built on Broadway and, in-deed in all Los Angeles. "The end of this era was foreshadowed on the opening night, which featured the premiere of Charlie Chaplin's 'City Lights,' " said Lee. "As the handsomely dressed guests started arriving at the theater—and they ranged from Chaplin to Albert Einstein - men in a breadlin across the street started hooting and booing." The year was 1931.

From the Broadway crowds, sidewalk clothing and food vendors, murals and music, it is only a block to Spring Street's dignified, early 20th-century office buildings. Just step through the block-long Broad-way-Spring Street Arcade between Fifth and Sixth. It's like leaving a Mexican fiesta and entering a room of Wall Street bankers. On Spring Street, imagine the pride that Angelenos must have felt looking at this masonry canyon, which stood not far from the fragrant orange groves, the not so fra-grant oil fields and the boisterous movie lots that provided Southern California with so much of its wealth. From these neoclassical 8-to-12-story buildings, which could easily fit into lower Manhattan or the Chicago Loop, businessmen, bankers and lawyers directed the boom that crested between 1920 and 1930, when Los Angeles's population soared from 576,673 to 1,238,048. During the '50s, banks, corporations and professional concerns moved from Spring Street to high-rises on Figueroa and Flower Streets. By the '60s and '70s, many Spring Street office buildings were nearly empty. Although two buildings have been converted to condominiums and a performing arts center known as the Los Angeles Actor's Theater, has opened at No. 514, Spring Street still wears the subdued, almost melancholy air of a place that relishes past glories rather than present accomplishments.

But Spring Street's decline has proved a blessing in disguise. Except for occasional ground-floor alterations, most buildings are virtually unchanged. Look at the elaborate roofline comices. Step into lobbies. One of the best is in the former Hermann W. Hellman Building (now the Banco Popular Building) at 354 South Spring Street, completed in 1903. The lobby boasts a curving white marble double stairway, white marble walls and trim and stained glass, including a dome adomed with the initials H. W. H.

ACK on Broadway, the Cameo The ater (1911), just north of the Arcade, is the oldest continuously operated the ater in Los Angeles and the city's best surviv-ing example of a mickelodeon, according to Marc Wanamaker, a film and theater histori-an. Other than the refreshment stand, the now grimy lobby is unchanged, as is the unadorned 850-seat auditorium.

To understand how quickly the fledgling motion picture industry came of age, compare the modest Cameo with the opident Million Dollar Theater erected six years later at 307 South Broadway. Taking its name from its reputed construction budget, the Million Dollar was one of America's first. true movie palaces, built by Sid Grauman, who later created the Egyptian and the Chinese theaters on Hollywood Boulevard.

Next door to the Million Dollar's baroque fantasies the Grand Cental Market is very real, much like the Reading Market in Philadelphia or the Park Avenue Market in Har-

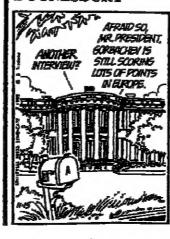

Across the stand from the Grand Central Market stands a drab-looking brown brick building. Once past the unremarkable arched entrance, however, you immediately recognize the soaring interior court of the Bradbury Building (1893). This five-story court has frequently appeared in movies and television shows, but you always feel a thrill seeing its sunlight-washed spaces, the lacy wrought-iron railings at every floor and the noiseless wrought iron open-cage elevators.

Leaving the Bradbury Building you are back on teeming Broadway. Gazing at Bunker Hill, which rises several blocks to the west, you see the monument-like Music Center and the sleek glass office towers of the city's prosperous and orderly new down-town. By contrast, Broadway is high spirited, noisy and often downright dirty. Yet it offers a remarkable glimpse into early 20th-century Los Angeles, an era when a dusty overgrown town quickly became one of America's largest, most fabled cities. And today Broadway is reality to far more Angeless than, say, the better-known hills of Bel Air or the beaches of Malibu.

Charles Lockwood is the author of seven books about U.S. cities and architecture. He wrote this article for The New York Times.

Taking the Spouse Along: Gray Area for Executives

by Roger Collis

MARRIED him for better or worse, but not for hunch." "I'd never dream of taking a man with me on a business trip: What would he do?" "Accompanying my husband to conferences is one of the joys of my life." "Why do companies feel they've got to include the spouse? It's humiating, you're not treated like a human being in your own right."

These are some random responses to what has become a vexed question: Whether or not executives should take their spouses (sorry, partners) on business trips and to conferences. It's a gray area of corporate practice—seldom articulated in formal policies. The answer, of course, depends on the executive, his or her partner, what kind of trip, who picks up the tab, and ultimately the tax authorities. But it is an issue that can have a decisive effect on the more hour effective decisive effect on the morale and effectiveness of the long-distance manager.

A partner who is politically aware can be a huge asset during indoctrination trips to the corporate Kremlin, or in breaking the ice with potential customers, especially in countries where socializing is inseparable from business. "This is the case in China and in Japan, where they're beginning to recognize the benefits of having the spouse along," says an airline executive. On the other hand, an executive can easily lose commitment and cutting edge by taking a partner on a hard-nosed tour of the markets, which is why many companies require executives to ask permission, even if they pay themselves.

Absence may or may not make the heart grow fonder. But many a relationship has survived in spite of or because of prolonged or frequent trips by one of the partners. There's the "honeymoon effect" when the traveler gets home to balance the risk of rival relationships developing.

The more enlightened firms recognize what is often a problem by offering the spouse an occasional trip as a kind of reward, "It's sometimes important to convince. a wife that traveling on business isn't a vacation, it's a lot of pain and grief. Enrolling the wife — that's an American model we're learning from," says a British execu-tive. "It makes the gny's life a bit easier at home and costs peanuts; most hotel rooms are doubles anyway and there are all sorts of deals, like the QE2, where you can take another person free," says Arthur Lyddall, travel manager at Chevron in London.

According to Charles Dufault, manager, management development and training, for Philip Morris Europe in Lausanne, "We'd allow a wife to travel for a portion of time if we have someone away for longer than six weeks, or when social activities are foreseen. . . If an executive is traveling a lot, we could agree to taking his spouse along at his own expense."

Few companies are as forthcoming as - : 2: Philip Morris about their policies. According to David Lincoln, a London-based partner of Towers, Perrin, Forster & Crosby Inc., : international consultants in pay and benefits, the whole issue of spouse travel is shrouded in reticence. "It's informal, brown envelope stuff. Early this year we did a survey of 48 big companies in the U.K.; only four of them declared any formal po---- jee licy. But in fact out of 850 executives, just under 20 percent had actually had this benefit in the last 12 months — this rose to 35 percent at chief executive level. I think this is an understatement; it's not something they want to broadcast." Says Jim Dillman, manager of TPF&C in Frankfurt: "In Germany we don't get a lot of hard data to this question, people don't like to talk about it.

Companies are looking at spouse travel as a way to increase benefits, but the lax authorities here are so structured that they would find it an unjustified business expense."

The same is true in Sweden, a country of exceptionally high taxes. "This is very touchy, of course, if you bring your wife on a business trip; the tax anthorities are very strong here. I think we'd better have a discussion among ourselves and call you back," (they never did), said a spokesman for SAF, the Swedish Employers' Federation.

Tax is the biggest single inhibitor of spouse travel, affecting both the company and the individual. "If it is declared, and that's a big "if," then unless "it is wholly and spousively required for business reasons," the exclusively required for business reasons' the tax is computed on the basis of cost to the company of transporting and accomodating the spouse," Lincoln says. But how do you split up the respective costs? "That's the flaky area; you get everything from outright lying to telling less than the truth. For example, you might ask for a letter from the U.S. parent company inviting an executive over, indicating a genuine business reason for hav-ing his wife along, say for meeting custom-ers. But the Inland Revenue's very wary of these purely social functions. Another way is to get a friendly travel agent to word the invoice in a very careful way, so that it's just not picked up.

Taxes and morale important factors in setting policy

According to Dillman, the U.S. Internal Revenue Service has no clear up-front rule. "You can usually negotiate a pro-rata amount, part of the air travel and so on. You discuss it with your accountant, make a choice, put in your return - subject to an audit which may or not hold water."
In spite of the tax hassles, business travel with a partner seems to be on an upswing, especially for conferences. "Typical of this is the annual sales or management shindig in the Bahamas, which is dressed up as a planning exercise." Lincoln says.

Not all women appreciate joining their men at corporate events. A British journalist, Liz Hodgkinson, says: "I think it's dreadful; the whole thing's got out of hand. I think it's humiliating, you're just treated like an ap-pendage. I refuse to be treated as an 'accompanying spouse' and not as a person in my own right. No wonder the women's movement never got anywhere."

The women's movement has at least (mostly) won the right for female executives to bring their men along to company func-tions, though not all seem to want to do so. Says Annie Redmile, a London-based con-sultant, "Taking somebody along on a business trip is always a problem unless they're actually involved in your own business. I'd rather enjoy myself with the man in my life when I'm on relaxed time at home."

And does it matter whether a couple is married? Not really, according to most com-panies, although "we still make a distinction between a legal spouse and concubines, or friends" at annual managers' meetings at Philip Morris, Dufault says.

There are no such inhibitions in France, according to Marcel Dumont, assistant to the secretary-general at the prestigious CPA business school in Paris. "French executives rarely travel with their wives and when they do take someone it's often the mistress. Companies close their eyes." And what about the tax angle? An almost palpable Gallic shrug at the other end of the phone.
"In France, most people cheat a little bit." ■

Historic León and a Palatial Hotel

by Mary Peirson Kennedy

EON, Spain — "Can you imagine Handel's "Messiah" emanating here from this patio and flooding the whole hotel? It sent shivers down my back last July when I stood here and Miguel Garcia, a member of the front desk staff of the San Marcos Hotel here is stand-ing on the loggia of a huge patio trying to explain why this hotel, where he has worked for 15 years, is not like any other.

The magnificent building, completed in its present form in 1549, was once a refuge for pilgrims on their way to Santiago de Compostela in northwestern Spain. Today its ornate and delicately carved facade rises above brillantly colored flower beds at the end of a broad avenue. It seems that this cannot possibly be just a hotel, and actually

This 27,000-square-meter building, designed in large part — in particular the facade — by the architect Juan de Badajoz (who did El Escorial outside of Madrid) is not only big enough to contain an orchestra and chorus, but it also contains a museum, a church and a magnificent choir stall done by Juan de Juni, a pupil of Michelangelo. The hotel itself has four dining rooms, two kitchens, immense salons and 260 rooms. The rooms are divided between two sections—a modern wing where the rooms are more or less the same except for different furnishings, and the old original section where no two rooms are identical. There is a baronial suite that includes canopied beds and a mar-ble dining table that seats 12, a tower room tucked away at the top of the hotel, a cozy retreat with a sitting room at one end of the bedroom and of course various single and double rooms, all with private baths. Included in the antique and modern furnishings are more than 1,300 paintings by not only old masters but contemporary Spanish artists as

It is run by ENTURSA, a state organiza-tion that operates 12 luxury hotels, three of them historic monuments, including this one. After its religious function ceased in the last century, it was for years a horse breeding and veterinary center for the Spanish Army. In the 1960s the work began to convert it into a hotel. "It is slow because everyone is always leaning over our shoulders to be sure we do not destroy anything of historical value, "explained Don Cesar Alvarez, the hotel director. "Can you imagine what it is to repair plumbing in a 436-year-old building? The biggest part of our operating budget is spent on restoring antiques and our heating has to be very carefully filtered to prevent damage to the paintings."

The museum at the other end of the hotel s housed behind the church altar and if you go there on weekends you can observe, discreetly hidden behind the great stone arches, a procession of local bridal parties who have opted to marry in the church and thea traipse across the worn stone passageways to the San Marcos for their receptions. In the warm weather these affairs are held on the loggia of the patio and the guests sit in quaint hooded wicker or straight-backed, carved antique chairs typical of the country homes in the province of León. These chairs, according to Miguel Garcia, are similar to the Leoneses, — "stiff and hard."

HE museum in the hotel has Roman and medieval religious objects. Perhaps the most interesting piece is an ivory crucifix from the 12th century, called the "Christ of Carrizo," with a regal, almost disdainful, figure of Christ with no trace of suffering in his face. A young man in charge said, pointing to this crucifix, "No one here paid much attention to this piece until an American museum offered us $450,000 for it, and then we put it under glass and agreed with one another that it was indeed rare and

Founded by the Seventh Roman Legion of Augustus in the first century, this city on the banks of the Bernesga River was later captured by Moslems, who were in turn driven out in the eighth century. León, the people will tell you, had eight kings before Spain was even a united country.

A Gothic cathedral, inspired by the one in Reims, dominates the city. On weekends it is especially impressive at night when flood-lights illuminate it from every angle. Inside the church there is a lovely cloister strewn with huge Roman artifacts and a museum of religious art including a curious painting of the St. Paul looking very cross. For 150 pesetas you can buy a ticket and a guide will take you around to the five salons that house

History and art critics often speak of the Romanesque basilica of San Isidoro in León as being more in keeping with the Spanish character than Gothic architecture. It is certainly beautiful. Completed in 1067 it has the funerary chapel of the kings of Leon and the bones of San Isidoro, a popular Spanish saint of the sixth century whose remains were credited with helping to drive the Moors from Spain. The remains are said to have been brought from Seville in 1063 and put in an omate silver reliquary covered with bas relief figures. The main one is of God, Adam, Eve and the Serpent in a fine example of buck-passing — God is pointing to Adam. Adam to Eve, and Eve to the Serpent!

Not far from the cathedral, down a neat winding street where religious objects are for sale next door to judo parlors and sauna baths, is the central market, a huge plaza offering a wealth of meats, vegetables, fruit and fish. With such raw materials it is no wonder that eating in León is an adventure. There are several good restaurants, at the top of the list the elegant dining room of the San Marcos. Trout is often on the menu (stuffed with salty ham, in one combination). They will proudly tell you that their paella took first prize in a nationwide contest, or you can have smoked salmon, caviar and French wines. The selection here is large,

LTHOUGH the Bodega Regia may not A be as elegant, it has brought fame to the city with its national culinary awards. This rustic restaurant with beamed ceilings in the oldest part of León, the Barrio Humedo (so-called because the walls of the houses are always damp), has three floors of large and small dining rooms and specializes in cocido, a heavy bean, vegetable and meat stew, a large choice of homemade sausages (try cecina), smoked bull meat, roasted green peppers, roast meats and fish, these last two done in woodburning ovens. They have a wine cellar that boasts of some of the best of the Spanish wines (Riojas from '43, '57 and '74 and some local Leonesa wines from three excellent years, '48, '67 and '81). And for dessert there is natillas con nueces a mouth-watering cream custard served with walnuts. Another local specialty is patatas brava, a highly spiced cooked potato that can be eaten hot or cold and is found in all the tapa bars, which in León also offer tiny plates of cocido, a variety of sausages, morcillà (a pork dish), pulpos (octopus) and many trout dish-

The countryside around León is rich in medieval, Roman, Mudejar (Moslems living under Christian rule) and Mozarabic (Spanish Christians living under Moslem rule) art and history.

The biggest suite at the San Marcos is 18,500 pesetas in the high season (Easter week and July through September) and 17,300 pesetas the rest of the year, A double room is 9,350 pesetas in season and 8,350 off season and a single is 5,900 and 5,500 pesetas respectively. For full pension add 3,600 pesetas a person year round. A lunch or dinner, if you order the menu, is about 1,800 pesetas. Breakfast, not included, is 500 pesetas. Figure about 160 pesetas to the U.S. dollar. These prices do not include a 5 percent tax that is added onto most tourist items in the country. These prices are good until April, 1986, and after that there will be a 12 percent

At the Bodega Regia you can eat well with wine and three plates for around 1,200 pesetas. If make the round of tapa bars, count on around 500 pesetas a person. León is 327 kilometers (202 miles) northwest of Madrid by superhighway and good primary roads. There is no airport, but there good train service from both Madrid and the French border at Irun-Hendaye.

A Lament for the Ocean Voyage

by Hans Koning

AST month I crossed the Atlantic on the Queen Elizabeth II from England to the United States. Apart from the vast amount of entertainment the ship provided for an age that has forgotten how to amuse itself unaided, the voyage was much like those I made 30-odd years ago, when sea travel was the normal way to go and when passenger ships linked New York with Southampton, Cherbourg, Rotterdam, Hamburg, Naples.

Walking the deck of the QE2, thinking back to the glass-enclosed decks of the old Queen Elizabeth, it seemed amazing how fast the transition from ship to plane has been, how quickly that tradition of the sea, so solidly anchored in Western culture and folklore, has vanished. When trains started to push out mail coaches, it took the best part of the 19th century before the changeover was complete, and my 1914 Baedekers still list all sorts of alternatives, such as river steamers, horsedrawn tramways, and indeed coaches, for many routes.

It is now 27 years since the first nonstop jet services began in the autumn of 1958 from New York to London and to Paris and that was when the curtain really started to descend on the ocean liners, first on the Atlantic and then on the Pacific. Now the OE2 is the last ship to run a regular Atlantic run, though from April to November only (to which may be added the summer crossings of the Polish Stephan Batori, formerly the Dutch Ryndam, which docks in Halifax rather than New York). The northern seas are once more as empty of passenger ships as in the days of Amerigo Vespucci and it's only cruises that have kept some of the finest liners, built as recently as the 1960s, affoat, while on the Mediterranean and the North Sea the new vogue of car ferries keeps some flags flying. Apart from convenience, train travel around 1900 was about eight times faster than coaches; the jet plane is 15 times faster than the great liners.

Until around 1960, flying was still more expensive than going by boat. Flying was the luxury way of travel, sailing the common one, although of course Cunard, the French Line, the Holland-America Line, and others, competed in trying for the best service and the best food for their pampered first class. Those were class-conscious days on ships.

On my first crossing, as a student in third class on the old Queen Mary, I shared a four-bunk cabin with three other men; the steward would open our door at 7 A.M. sharp, turn on the light, and call us out of bed like an army sergeant. When we docked in Southampton, we were escorted in little sitting in a room in cabin (second) class: even at the end of the voyage we weren't allowed to set foot across the class boundary line by ourselves. One of my cabin mates wanted to take a picture of the cabin class swimming pool but he was refused.

First class, on the other hand, was like life as a guest of a millionaire or a viscount, with an unending stream of eating and drinking delights from breakfast in bed to the midnight buffet, a "boots" to do your shoes, and bathtubs with four gold taps (or maybe gild-ed), hot and cold fresh water, hot and cold filtered sea water. The People's Expresses and Freddie Lakers of those days were mosty student sailings in converted World War II Liberty and Victory ships, and they took you to Europe in 10 days for a $100 or so.

As planes became cheaper, relatively and even absolutely, ships became more expensive. Two main reasons: one, wages (in the old days, crews could be found willing to ship out for not much more than room, i.e. a bunk, and board), and two, oil. When in the early '70s we in the West stopped getting our oil at bargain basement prices, the cost of running a ship's engine shot up and almost overnight motorships with their heavy diesels or turbines such as the Queen Elizabeth and the Queen Mary became economically impossible. New ships with much greater fuel efficiency were then built — the QE2 is one — but that did not stop the price spiral. A crossing now on the QE2 is value for money, in my estimation, if you have the money. It is still like a long weekend in a posh country house. But seen as travel rather than a cruise, it is doubtless an indulgence, with even the simple cabins on the lower decks costing several times the price of a nature of the beast. Through the '60s and '70s we heard regularly of plans to build simple ships, sort of floating YMCA's, with cafeterias, and with trans-Atlantic fares of a $100 to $150. At one point a West German concern announced itself ready to go ahead with this. Nothing came of it: the development has been in the opposite direction, with planes also providing for that basic no-trimmings market, and with Cunard, as the last er, richer, cruise-type traveler.

Y regretting this is barking up a no longer existing tree. Cunard and others must have done their sums; there is no floating Y in our future. A pity. Not only are there people of all ages and classes who hate flying, but more positively, whole generations do not know the ocean anymore except as seen from a beach. The love for the sea, inbred for so long in the English, the Scandinavians, the French, the Dutch, and their American descendants, the mystery of that great and separate element, they remain a closed book. That alone might be a reason to hold out for the sea voyage, if

And you would not travel by sea in spite of, but because of the fact that it takes four or five days. Days without telephone calls, television, the lastest bad news, and jet lag. Perhaps it is as fast as we can handle. Perhaps the human mind cannot absorb the transition from Europe to America or vice versa much quicker, and when you ship your body by plane, your mind arrives five days later. When our ship docked one Friday evening in October, it felt fantastic to me that only five days earlier I had walked English streets, ridden a London cab, eaten chips with vinegar flavor. Looked at from 12th Avenue in the rain, with cops waving. Yellow Cabs honking, that wary excitement in the air of Manhattan, the lights of the tall buildings coloring the foggy night, Europe was years if not light years away.

Hans Koning's new novel, "Acts of Faith," will be published this winter by Gollancz.

"Paperback Poets" series began. These inexpensive volumes were hugely successful. Da-

began to change. Poets Rodney Hall and Shapcott edited "New Impulses in Austra-lian Poetry" in 1968. And in 1970 the UQP vid Malouf, now one of Australia's foremost fiction writers, published a book of poems that went into three printings of about 2,000 copies each. Average print runs everywhere for first editions of poems tend to be between 500 and 1,500 copies.

The University of Queensland Press began publishing prose in 1973. Peter Carey's first collection of rather surreal short stories, "The Fat Man in History," drew immediate critical acclaim for technical bravura and a touch of oddness that seemed to have no precedent. Since then the UQP has discovered and nortured an impressive array of excellent writers.

As word spread upward from down under about the harvest of good authors, houses such as the UQP found some of their discoveries being lured away by British publishers in search of new names. This problem was less felt at Penguin because of its interna-tional status. Nevertheless when Brian Johns took over there six years ago it was only doing 20 to 30 books a year, mostly in current affairs. It now publishes around 120 paperbacks: 40 percent nonfiction, 30 percent children's books and 30 percent fiction.

"We were having a revival of Australian theater and film in the late seventies. So it just seemed logical to me that people would be interested in fiction too," Johns explains. "What we did was to reverse the usual publishing policy. We used paperbacks for ex-panding the market, and hardbacks for con-One of Penguin's early titles was a remarkable novel by Jessica Anderson entitled "Tirra Lirra by the River." This is a quietly lyrical and humorous depiction of youth in Queensland in the early 1900s, young adulthood in Sydney and maturity in London, seen through the eyes of a woman, who, in old age, returns to her birthplace and reflects upon the way she grew up by escaping. The first print run was of 3,000 copies, but sales now stand at 60,000. "Sometimes print runs may seem small, but they're relatively strong when seen against the size of the population," Johns says. "In the U.S.A., for the not-super best sellers, 20 or 30 thousand is considered a very good figure. Well, we're achieving that regularly. But it's not only a matter of capturing our own markets. We won't have a proper publishing industry until we start exporting. I'm pushing us overseas, but it's not easy. America's quite an insular country, actually, and the U.K. is even worse."

Things are beginning to move, however, and this may be connected with the negotiating of an increasing number of film rights of books by Australian authors. A Sydneybased literary agent, Rose Creswell, has re-cently handled the rights for "Cocacola based on Frank Moorhouse's book, Peter Corns's "The Empty Beach," Jean Bedford's "Kate" and Blanche d'Alpuget's Turtle Beach."

So this is the happy moment for Australian writing. People are all still helping each other, major fends and backbiting have not yet broken out, and good manuscripts keep rolling in.

Kate Singleton, a journalist based in Milan, writes frequently on cultural affairs.

Four Women Writers

OUR very different women writers can give some idea of the range of contemporary. contemporary Australian fiction, and some of its salient characteristics as well. They are Olga Masters, Helen Garner, Beverly Farmer and Blanche d'Al-

Blanche d'Alpuget is the exception that confirms the local rule, which is a good reason for talking about her first. Unlike most of her fellow writers, male or female, she chooses to cell a tale with fairly traditional narrative structure. What is new in her work is the reality recounted: the problems of contrasting interests and cultures in Indonesia ("Monkeys in the Dark," 1980) and in Malaysia ("Turtle Beach," 1981). In both these books an ambitious young Australian woman working in Southeast Asia finds herself involved in local issues with widespread national and international political implica-tions. She ends up disillusioned, but perhaps wiser. She controls the telling of these stories with such a firm hand that her books make compulsive reading, without ever slipping into the banality of the easy read.

Beverly Farmer is the master of the short story. "Milk" (1983) is a collection that centers around village life in Greece, or Greek community life in Australia. They are epi-sodes rather than events, described with extraordinary poetic delicacy. In just a few pages Farmer can draw out the essence of conflicting or overlapping feeling and perceptions between people of different ages, generations, cultural and geographical backrounds. Old age and illness that grasp after elusive dignity are two difficult subjects she deals with remarkably. Children feature a lot in her stories too: the hopeful side of the

Helen Garner handles the long short sto-ry, or the short novel, particularly well. Her characters are ordinary, recognizable young people living in cities like Melbourne; single-parent families, artificial families that build up in large households where the adults need as much support as the children. Her forte has always been her dialogues and the way she describes thought processes. Since "Honour and Other People's Children" (1980), her prose has tightened up. "The Children's Bach" (1984) is a fine, terse study of relationships. Perhaps too close to the bone for some; but impressive nevertheless.

Olga Masters only began writing seriously once her seven talented children were out of the home, making successes of their own lives. "The Home Girls" (1982) won the National Book Council Award in 1983 and immediately established its author as one of the most powerful and original new Australian writers. These are stories of a rural Australia of a few decades ago. The depiction of characters and places is effortless and often funny. Stylistically she is a natural innovator. Her sentences are often startlingly devoid of punctuation (just like many of our thought processes). She effectively contrasts short sharp phrases, strung one below the other rather than together in paragraphs, with softer, more flowing descriptive pas-

Despite a cool critical reception, "Sihanouk" is selling out. The largely young audience squeezes tightly onto the upholstered benches and even sits on the steps. Above the spectators' heads, propped up along a gallery that runs around the theater space, a crowd of dolls dressed in a variety of Eastern and Western garb conveys the sense that the whole world is watching in awed silence and in judgment of the proceedings on the stage. Cixous caricatures all parties involved in the death of a great culture: the Cambodians themselves, their Vietnamese neighbors, the Americans, the Chinese, the Russians and the Khmer Rouge. Sihanouk, played by Georges Bigot, is depicted not only as a sensitive artist but as a cunning diplomat caught in the web spun by the major powers. Bigot shuffles, dances, leaps, as though nim-

Saint-Martin of two Woody Allen sketches written some 20 years ago. "Death" and "God" combined into an awkward diptych under the grand title, "Dieu, Shakespeare et Moi," are attracting a substantial middleclass, middlebrow audience.

"Death" features the typically hangdog Woody Allen hero. As played by Pierre Richard, a favorite with French movie buffs. the hero, named Kleiman, is a lucid coward. Despite his sound survival instinct, he allows himself to be inveigled into joining a group of scary and scared vigilantes who are tracking down an elusive mad strangler. Alone in the empty canyons of a deserted metropolis. this latter-day Candide wonders why he left his warm bed only to face rival bands of vigilantes and other potential victims.

When Kleiman finally runs into a punylooking killer, played by the actor Rufus, he attempts to reason with him, even after the madman points out that this approach is wasted on the insane. Kleiman's obsession has caught up with him.

In "God," which makes up the second half of the evening, a limp rag doll is lowered onto the stage by means of a red halter attached to a cable. As the bearded, togaclad puppet flops down, a familiar Nietzschean pronouncement is delivered: "God is dead!" Then the play goes on to indulge in the mock-Pirandellian device of questioning the relations between public and performers.

The plays' extraordinary success owes much to Woody Allen's talismanic reputation in Europe, and especially in France. Together with Jerry Lewis, Allen has become a cult figure. He is viewed as a metaphysical comic, the uncommonly common man who lets it all hang out. The French have always taken pride in understanding certain aspects of America better than the Americans them-selves: Edgar Allan Poe made his mark in France thanks to the superb translations of Baudelaire. William Faulkner's mythical South was probed by the generation of Le

The myth of Hollywood is still powerful in France. "Dieu Shakespeare et Moi" is another sign of this fascination with America, and the disinternment of these buried early sketches has proved to be a commercial

If You Say 'Speak to Me,' It May Be Hal Who Answers

EW YORK — Computers are very good at processing information once it has been entered into their memones. The problem is getting it there. This is a particular problem in industrial applications, where timely reporting on inventory levels and quality control is often slowed by delays in entering data.

"In a typical inspection situation, you have a person with a clipboard making notes on defects and problems as production ones off the line, said Daniel F. Fink, an executive with the intel Corp.'s Integrated Systems Operation. Then it goes to

There are two

reypunch at night and the responsible executive gets a report in the morning Mean-while, a whole day's production has gone out with

For that reason, voice-entry systems — whereby people alk directly to a computer have been viewed for at least a lecade as a potentially attractive means of getting information no a computer system quickly. Then it would be available for mmediate analysis and could be used to fine-tune production. In addition, a worker wearing a microphone attached to a headset has eyes and hands free and can concentrate on reporting events without having to look away to write or use a keyboard.

That vision seems much closer to reality today, with two new voice-control systems introduced recently and with more report-

In spite of its potential advantages, voice entry has been slow o come to the factory floor. Many attempts at practical applicaions required users to develop expensive custom softwear for ach application. With some it was difficult to sort out spoken commands from the noisy background of many shops. Others were so complicated that workers balked at using them.

OW several companies, including Westinghouse and Intel, have developed voice-entry systems that they say have solved these problems and are ready for industrial use. 30th demonstrated their products this month at the Autofact 85 actory automation conference in Detroit. Each system is in imited commercial application now, including one used for juality control in an auto factory.

Speech-recognition systems operate by attempting to match he frequency pattern of each incoming word with ones already stored in the memory. The difficulty is that the computer memory conired increases with the size of the vocabulary. And people say he same words in such dissimilar ways that no pattern can be ised for a given word.

Both the Westinghouse and Intel systems overcome these difficulties by having each user "train" the machine to recognize a imited number of words in the user's speech pattern. Each berson speaks the words he or she will be using several times to stablish an individual "voice template."

With the Intel system, users have a bubble memory cartridge containing their template that is inserted at the work station efore operations begin. Westinghouse stores all the templates on central hard disk, and users identify themselves by entering a umeric code on a keyboard.

The number of words the systems will recognize is limited — 60 for Westinghouse, 200 for Intel — but since each word presents a code, a substantial amount of information can be ntered using a small vocabulary.

Both companies have gone to some length to make their ystems user-friendly, so they will be accepted by workers. By imply saying "relax," workers can make the systems pause, so hey can talk to a fellow worker without putting in false data.

U.S. Sales Fell 3.3% In October

Record Decline Paced by Autos

WASHINGTON — U.S. retail sales plunged a record 3.3 percent in October, the government reported Thursday.

The Commerce Department said retail sales, depressed by a sharp drop in anto purchases, fell $3.9 billion to an October level of $115.5 billion.

The drop in auto sales followed a buying spree in August and Sep-tember, when U.S. automakers offered cut-rate financing. Auto sales fell a record 14.6 percent last month after increases of 6.1 per-cent in August and 8 percent in

Without the decline in demand for autos, retail sales would have risen 0.5 percent in October.

The Commerce Department also revised downward September's increase in retail sales, to 2.1 percent from 2.7 percent, Economists have been warning that consumer buying may be slow-ing because of weak growth in per-sonal income and a record level of

The percentage of disposable in-come needed to satisfy personal debt stands at a record 19.2 per-cent. Also, the level of personal savings has fallen to a record low of 1.9 percent as consumers dipped into savings to finance auto purchases in August and Septemi

Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige said consumer spending in coming months would not match gams in the first half of 1985.

"Strong gains in household spending since the beginning of the year cut the saving rate to histori-cally low levels while debt relative to income has risen to new peaks," he said. "As a result, we should see temporarily slower growth in household spending."

The big surge in auto sales was one of the main factors boosting overall economic growth to a 3.3percent annual rate in the Julyptember quarter.

While the Reagan administration is predicting that economic growth this quarter will be higher than that of the third quarter, many analysts are forecasting a decline because auto sales are expected to be much weaker. Car sales during the first 10 days of November, for example, were down 12.4 percent from a year earlier.

The October decline in retail passing the previous record of a 2.2-percent drop in March 1975,

Australian Treasurer Ties Revival to Incomes Policy

By Colin Chapman ional Rerald Tribune

LONDON — Paul Keating returned to his hotel after an afternoon's browsing recently in three or four of the better known antique shops in Lon-don's West End. As well as being Australia's treasurer — and the second most powerful politician after the prime minister, Bob Hawke — he is a collector. But this time he had no treasures to take "A lot of it is junk," he said, "and some of the people in those places are so condescending, yet they are probably on only about £60 [about $85] a

Mr. Keating, 41, feels the same way about many of Europe's economic policies, particularly in Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's Britain, He puts it simply. "They're stuffed," he said.

Australia's treasurer believes that he has good reason to be confident that his government's poli-cies, rather than Mrs. Thatcher's basically monetarist ones, are the right ones, at least for Australia. When Mr. Hawke's Labor Party government won office in March 1983, the economy was contracting; inflation and unemployment were both in double digits, and the country was bogged down with labor unrest and a highly protected financial with abort intest and a nightly protected intantial and manufacturing sector.

Within 12 months, thanks partly to the end of a crippling drought and, perhaps, a modest world economic recovery, growth had sped up, and, as a result of a wage-restraint accord with organized labor, both inflation and unemployment shrank. The Australian government's policy is usually called an incomes policy, a broad phrase covering the various direct forms of inflation and unemployment control by government, including freezes or less severe curbs on increases in prices, wages, rents and dividends. This is dramatically different from the monetarism of Mrs. Thatcher, which advocates strict control of the money supply as its major economic weapon

Treasurer Paul Keating of Australia.

This year, Australian officials think that the new policies really began to pay off. Economic growth, excluding agriculture, in the fiscal year to June 30 was 5 percent, considerably faster than the previous year's 3.4 percent, And Mr. Keating projected nonagricultural growth at 5.5 percent for the current fiscal year. As recently as fiscal 1983, the gross domestic product, which measures the total value of a nation's goods and services, excluding income from foreign investments, fell 1.2 percent.

The current jobless rate is 7.9 percent; when the party came to office it was 11.5 percent. Meanwhile, inflation has fallen to 7.6 percent from 12

Corporate profits as a share of national income are now at an historically high 15 percent, and unemployment is falling, despite a rapid growth in the work force, allowing the government to claim that it has created proportionately more jobs than any other country in the Western World.

If these fruits of an incomes policy were unpr dicted, so were other changes introduced by Mr. Keating, especially major deregulation of the fi-(Continued on Page 15, Col. 1)

U.K. Bank Offers Loan to ITC of $783 Million

LONDON - Standard Chartered Bank PLC, in a revised proposal to the International Tin Council offered on Thursday a direct loan of up to £552 million ($783 million) to enable the council to meet existing tin-purchase obli-gations until Jan. 23, an official document shows. The document, circulated at an ITC emergency session in London, was accompanied by a letter from the bank's senior vice chairman, Peter Graham. Mr. Graham is chairman of the group of 16 ITC creditors, which had made an earlier offer of a financing package that would involve a large loan facility in which more banks would partici-

In the accompanying letter, Mr. Graham said the new offer was cheaper and its procedures were simpler than the offer made earlier by the group of 16.

Standard Chartered is prepared to put up the whole facility, selling it down — offering it to other participants — when the actual amount is established, he said.

The document shows that after Jan. 23 the loan would be available to the ITC for working capital purposes. It would be drawn down over a period of one year, repaid over three years in equal annual amounts and secured by state guar-

Earlier Thursday, the chairman said the LME would allow the ITC to trade only in cash after the sus-pended trade in tin resumes. Jacques Lion, the chairman, said the restriction would be accompanied by a cut in production and a reduction of existing tin stockpiles.

Mr. Lion made his remarks as

The LME suspended tin trading on Oct. 24 after the ITC, a group of 22 tin producing and consuming countries, said it had run out of funds. A planned resumption of trading next Monday was postponed Wednesday for at least another week, apparently because creditors feared that the lack of an overall solution to the tin crisis would send prices plunging,

No date has yet been set for the resumption of tin trading.

The creditor banks, which are owed £352 million, made their financing package conditional on guarantees from the central banks of the ITC's member nations. The stumbling block so far has been unwillingness by the ITC member governments to underwrite the ITC's obligations to creditors and traders, estimated at almost £1 billion.

At a news conference Thursday, Mr. Lion said the LME was confident of an early settlement after receiving pledges of support from central banks. "There is every prospect of a satisfactory solution in the not too distant future," he said. Industry sources said the ITC's meeting, expected to last for two days, was unlikely to come up with a quick solution.

Both producers and buyers had so far refused to give the creditors a collective financial commitment to get the industry back on its feet. Except for Thailand, none of the main ITC producing countries was prepared to give such guarantees. Britain, one of the major buyers, had no success in persuading fellow members of the European Community to honor their share of existing

The other week, in London, he set out the details of another major change in policy — toward boost-ing foreign investment. Australia has decided to abandon the rule that foreign companies planning a takeover or the establishment of a major business in Australia must first seek local participation, a major disincentive to investment, because then the foreign companies' intentions have to be advertised. Some other significant changes include putting foreign insurance companies and other nonbank financial institutions on the same basis as banks - able to compete freely with their Australian equiva-

"It's quite simple," he said. "You have no choice but to try an incomes policy, because the only alternative is to go back to deflation-ary fiscal and monetary policies which can only have the effect of reducing growth."

But doesn't wage restraint mean that sooner or later the floodgates will open?

"I could not say to you with any credibility that our policy will go on for ever," said Mr. Keating, "but it does have the great possibility of becoming the norm in Australia. We have had 21/2 years now, more important we have just won an agreement (with the unions) for another two years, so a total of 41/2 to five years is quite a long period in a country's economic history.

Mr. Keating's next major aim is to transform Australia's sometimes image as a granary and mine for Japan and other Western nations into one of economic dynamism. He cites Rupert Murdoch, who has used his News Corp. to build a worldwide media empire, Robert Holmes à Court, the takeover specialist who runs Bell Group, and John Elliott of Elders IXL, the conglomerate, as Australians whose business skills are internationally

COMITÉ COLBERT Hediard: A Vintage Investment

Imagination, quality and taste: The ingredients that have assured the success of Hediard, the renowned gournet food shop on the Place de la Madeleine, by pleasing discriminat-ing Parisian palates for 131 years, also characterize what Hediard president Philippe Brunon calls "the fin-est wine cellar in Paris."

In just over 12 years with the help of sommelier Lucien Babin, formerly of the Pre-Catelan and Fouquets. Brunon has assembled an exception-al collection of fine French wines and earned Hediard the increasing respect of the most knowledgeable oenophiles. Today, Hediard sells over 400,000 bottles of wine each year ranging from rare vintage Bordeaux dating back to 1928 to reasonably priced dinner wines and vins du pays sold under the Hediard label from 11 francs. "Selling wine is not complicated," says Philippe Brunon. "What is essential in the wine business is buying." So when Brunon, already a passionate wine connoisseur, came into Hediard in 1973 and decided to expand the wine cellar, he went to Bordeaux. "I had the luck to go there just as prices for the great chateaux wines collapsed." he recalls. Thanks to the contacts my father had initiated, the fact that the marker was knocked flat and needed the harvest when the wine is still manuring in casks, then sells some of these wines en primeur to their clients. Hediard's recent acquisition by the Guinness group has allowed Brunon to extend his wine develop-ment policy and with 1985 promising to be a memorable vincage year, he plans to offer 40 to 45 classified wines en primeur next spring at "super reasonable prices because no one buys cheaper in Bordeaux than Buying en primeur means a wait of two to three years before the wine is bortled and delivered, then a further five to 10 years before it is drinkable, so it can be, says Brunon, "like giving the grower a blank check." Hediard provides the security, buying technique and quality selection that absorbs most of the risk and gives the private buyer a chance to buy vintage wines at affordable prices.

With annual price rises averaging 20 percent. investing in fine wines has become an international pastime and sporting trends can be financially as well as gastronomically rewarding. Brunon sees a comeback for red Burgundies. He tips Vosne-Romanée and Chambertin as good investments now along with the bourgeois Bordezux growths of Chateau Villegeorge and Chateau Potensai. Even more marked is the new focus on Sautemes.

Christie's, who regularly auction wine in London, Amsterdam, Geneva and Chicago, recently devoted an entire sale to the legendary vintage Charcau d'Yquem's and Brunon recommends buying Sudurant, Climens and Sahue-les-Tour as well as

Prices Soften Amid U.S. Treasury Concerns

By David Ress

LONDON - Eurobond prices eased in lackluster trading domi-nated by concerns that backlogged U.S. Treasury borrowings would push domestic bond prices lower once the debt ceiling is increased, dealers said.

They said that these worries have offset the impact of buying by some investors looking to pick up yields as the spread between Eurobond and U.S. Treasury securities yields remains wide.

The wide spreads are discouraging potential borrowers from launching dollar-denominated Eurobonds, with Thursday's issues coming in the European currency unit, British pound and Deutschemark sectors.

to 50 basis points over Treasuries to around 70 to 80, but borrowers don't want to pay that much for dollar Eurobonds," one dealer said.

Thursday's issues included a £100-million, 12-year floating rate-note for New Zealand, on the same terms as a New Zealand issue launched in July, paying 1/16 over three-month London interbank offered rate. The two will be fully interchangeable. The note, lead managed by S.G. Warburg & Co., closed at 99.70 to 99.75, down from the 99.75 to 99.85 quoted for the July issue Thursday morning, but inside total fees of 35 basis points. The Victorian Public Authorities Finance Agency's 75-million-European-currency-unit, 8%-percent, rope, lead manager Banque Paribas Capital Markets said.

The issue was quoted at a discount of 34, well inside the 114-percent selling concession.

In the Deutsche-mark sector, Haindl Finance BV launched a 100-million DM, 7-percent bond due 1997 and priced at par in tan-dem with a 150-million-DM, zerocoupon issue due 2000, priced at 36.25 for an effective yield of 7 percent Deutsche Bank AG was ad manager.

The recent 1.2-billion-DM floating-rate note for Malaysia held steady at 99.36 to 99.39, inside total fees of 60 basis points, at which levels it was beginning to attract some buying dealers said.

They said the world's tin crisis seemed to have little impact on this

UNCOMMON CLAY: The Life and Work of Augustus Saint Gaudens

By Burke Wilkinson. 428 pages. Photographs by David Finn. $22.95. A Helen and Kurt Wolff Book - Harcourt

Brace Jovanovich, 1250 Sixth Avenue, San Diego, Calif. 92101.

Reviewed by John Gross

AUGUSTUS SAINT GAUDENS was the foremost American sculptor of his time, but he has had to wait until now for a biography — in large measure, no doubt, a reflection of how rapidly he fell out of favor as artistic tastes changed in the generation following his death in 1907.

Nor did the two volumes of his memoirs that appeared in 1913 do much do keep interest in him from ebbing away. They were written, as Burke Wilkinson explains in "Uncommon Clay," when he was already mortally ill, with his wife and family standing over him, and they present a bland image that conveys little of his robust personality and almost nothing of his tangled private life.

The most obvious concealments were those concerning his marriage. His wife came from an old New England family, and marrying her in 1877 represented a step up socially. (Saint Gaudens himself was the son of a French shoemaker who had settled in Dublin and then emigrated to the United States not long after his son was born.) But she was also a difficult woman, notorious for her stinginess and her

By the early 1880s, Saint Gaudens had fallen in love with a Swedish-born model whom he called Davida (after Michelangelo's David, Wilkinson surmises - her real name was Albertina). They had a son, and he continued to lead a secret life with her until a year or two before his death.

Despite the undoubted hold that she had over his emotions, Davida remains a shadowy figure, and there is little that Wilkinson can add to the bare outlines of the story. The most rewarding portions of "Uncommon Clay" are in fact those that deal with Saint Gaudens's professional experiences.

Wilkinson (a former State Department official and the author of a number of previous biographies) writes in a somewhat florid manner, and he has a weakness for playing around with hackneyed quotations—he is not above concluding a chapter on Saint Gaudens's bas-reliefs with the comment "For these reliefs, much thanks."

But what he lacks in finesse he makes up for in honest enthusiasm —a prime requisite when dealing with someone as full-blooded as Saint Gaudens - and in the diligence of his research. He has unearthed a great deal of worth-while material, some of it highly entertaining, and his narrative is enhanced by first-rate photographs of Saint Gaudens's work by Da-vid Finn. The sculpture that put the artist's name firmly on the map was the memorial to Admiral Farragut in Madison Square Park, New York. It also represented his first collaboration with the architect Stanford White, who designed the base. The two men were to work together on some even more striking schemes, most notably Madison Square Garden, de-

One of the most engaging mano: characters in "Uncommon Clay" is Julia Barra know the art world of the day as "Dudies" the most feet as a second feet of the day as "Dudies" the most feet of the day as "Dudies" who posed for Diana's ones. Yes, she had modeled for any number majestic figures in her time: "The throne haven't sat on are so few that you could count them on your fingers." No, she didn't mind posing in the nude — "in the toot and scramble," if you choose to call it that." ("Toot and scramble," Wikinson explains, wis a cheerful American garbling of "row ensemble," there the literal French translation of posing "in the literal French translation of posting "in the altogether.")

The account of the Adams Monument in Washington naturally strikes a more selection note. A powerful and mysterious piece of work, commissioned by Henry Adams in memory of his wife Clover, it has east its spell on counties admirers, from Mark Twain to John Galswey, thy, (In "The Forsyte Saga" it gives Soame, Forsyte more pleasure than anything else he sees in America.) Wilkinson is at his best discussing the monument's origins. Its reception, and Henry Adams's friendship with Suint Gaudens in general.

He also writes well about the Robert Gould Shaw Memorial on Boston Common - Shaw was a young Massachuseus aristocrat who had been killed leading his regiment of black sul-diers in the Civil War—though unaccountably he omis to mention that its presence pervades one of the most notable modern American poems. Robert Lowell's "For the Umon

But to make up for this be quotes a fine passage from Saint Gaudens in which the sculptor excuses kinsself for his long delay in completing the memorial (commissioned in 1882, it was not unveiled until 1897) by arguing that it would have been unforgivable for him to have given anything less than his best:

"There is something extraordinarily irritating, when it is not ludicrous, in a bad statue. A poor picture goes into the garret, books are forgotten, but the bronze remains.

Among the other episodes that enliven "Uncommon Clay," there are chapters on the Sher-man statue in New York (which would have. been sited near Grant's Tomb rather than in Grand Army Plaza if there had not been bad feeling between the Grant family and the surviving Shermans), and on Saint Gaudens's warm friendship with Robert Louis Stevenson Wilkinson also clears up a mystery that must have bothered many people coming across. Gooden of Mets Is Unanimous Choice As Top Pitcher in the National League

NEW YORK - After only two seasons in the big leagues, Dwight Gooden made more baseball history Wednesday when he became the youngest pitcher ever to win the Cy

Only three days short of his 21st birthday but already the national symbol of the strikeout, Gooden became the second pitcher in the New York Met history to win the award as the National League's best pitcher. Tom Seaver won three times: in 1969, 1973 and 1975.

Gooden also became the seventh pitcher in the 29-year history of the award to win manimously, getting all the first-place votes cast by a panel of baseball writers. He far outdistanced John Tudor of the St. Louis Cardinals, who got most of the second-place votes, and Orel Hershiser of the Los Angeles Dodgers, who got earned of the third-place votes.

But no pitcher has won it at so early an age. Fernando Valenzuela of the Dodgers was selected in 1981, just after his 21st birthday. Denmark, which needed only to avoid a heavy defeat in order to qualify for the first time ever, cruised to a 4-1 Group 6 triumph over Ireland in Dublin. But with Group 3 rival Romania winning, 3-I, in Turkey, the Northern Irish had to mount a stubborn rearguard action to hold England to a score-less draw at Wembley Stadium. England had already qualified; Northern Ireland gained the one point it needed to deny Romania and reach its second straight finals. . Northern Ireland owed its berth to an inspired performance by 40year-old goalie Pat Jennings, who is in semiretirement with the Tottenham reserves. Jennings set a world international appearance record for a goalkeeper by winning his 113th cap, one more than Italy's Dino Zoff. He kept his country's hopes alive by making three superb saves — deflecting two shots away with his hands and sticking a leg out to block another.

The saves proved decisive as England's strikers failed to penetrate a solid Irish defense. On the only occasion Jennings was beaten, on a chipped cross-cum-shot by Gary Stevens, the ball was hooked away

A frosty playing surface made it difficult for players to keep their feet, and few chances were created in the opening quarter of the game as movement continually broke down in midfield.

Glenn Hoddle almost broke the deadlock in the 29th minute with a beautiful left-footer from 30 meters Jan Sivebeck. The result gave Den-Mexico City.

At the other end Kerry Dixon, substituting for injured center for-ward Mark Hateley, missed a simple chance when a smart chip from Hoddle presented him with a header. Dixon had only Jennings to beat from little more than five meters, but his mistimed effort went wide.

The visitors forced two corners early in the second half, but the flow was soon reversed, with the English trying but failing to turn constant pressure into goals. Jennings made a reflex save with his right leg to deny Dixon, and soon afterward tipped a dangerous header by Dixon over the bar.

Despite publicly expressed Romanian fears that the two teams might collude, Northern Ireland's manager, Billy Bingham, was insis-tent that England had not simply allowed his team the draw it needed to reach Mexico. Said Bingham: "If anybody was

At 49, the Stilt's Still Taking His Shots

By Tim Lioua

The Associated Press
LOS ANGELES — Wilt Chamberlain, a youthful bonnce in his step, glides into a crowded restaurant and slips between the tables with a supple ease that belies his frame. His 7-foot-1 (2.15-meter) presence is still as imposing as the numbers he etched in the record books of professional basketball. And at 49, he still looks much as he did when he patrolled the lanes in the 1960s and early 1970s, when he was called Wilt the Stilt. a ferocions center known for thundering dunks, crashing rebounds and incredible stats.

Birt the game he played, the game he still follows closely, is a far cry from the game he so dominated until his retirement 12 years ago.

"It's a run-up-and-down-the-court-anddunk-the-hall game. These are speed merchants and jumping fools. That's why their shooting percentages are going way up," he says of today's National Basketball Association players.

"I led the league 11 times in field goal percentage and my lifetime average was 54 percent. There are five billion guys out there now shooting over 54 percent." Changed, too, are the playing conditions.

"Can you imagine playing when your hands are so cold and the ball is hard as a brick? asks Chamberlain. "I can remember going to Detroit and playing in the old De-troit Arena and there's about 3,000 people in this big old huge thing. Every time they opened the door, the wind blew through T can remember vividly Paul Arizin, who was one of the greatest players ever, going like this" - he blows into his hands as if to warm them - "and the smoke is blowing out of his nose. "Guys were shooting 37 percent, these were great shooters," he said. "People look at that today and say, Is that a basketball player or was he on a blind team? They don't know how to put that into perspective. It makes a big difference." Another big difference is travel.

"We traveled and played on the same day," Chamberlain said. "How about flying out at 7 o'clock in the morning and playing in Los Angeles? You can't fly all day long and play

Not that he likes comparisons. "Here's something that burns Wilt Chamberlain — when I listen to these various announcers doing the color for college or pro games. They say, 'Oh, Patrick Ewing blocked that shot like Bill Russell used to block shots.' These people have never seen Wilt Chamberlain or Bill Russell play basketball. They're just parrot-

Despite the Celtics' success, Chamberlain's teams were carving out a record that would have been lauded in any other era. In his 14 years in the NBA. A Packer Packin' Hay

By Russell Baker

N EW YORK — One Monday night while flicking a dial 1 paused for the Green Bay Packers. Maybe at last somebody would say what it is they pack in Green Bay.

They were playing the Bears, the Chicago Bears, always called in the days of my childhood "the Monsters of the Midway." And now I wondered, as they played with Green Bay, where in fact was that Midway that the Bears were the monsters of, "Where is that Midway?" I asked of the tube. "And what do they pack in Green Bay?"

The men of the tube - Frank, Ioe and O. J. - had plenty to say, all of it utterly incomprehensible. though perfectly sensible, I suppose, to those with Ph. D. degrees in football, so why should we cavil, carp and naysay if Frank, Ice and O. J. think it thoroughly O.K. to ignore our request for enlightenment: "Where is the Midway. Frank, Joe, or O. J., and what do they pack in Green Bay?"

Patience," I counseled my female co-viewer, yearning insistently for a dial search that might, with luck, she said, produce some nightconsuming nocturnal soap opera.

"Patience" I counseled her. "We shall yield to your hunger for im-plausibility, but first let us pray that Frank, Joe or O. J. will sense

"Hey, you TV guys, you!"
I was crying out loud to the tube. "For crying out loud, fellows, if you know won't you say what or where's the Midway and what they pack in Green Bay?"

No, they would not. My female co-viewer said, "They are so implausibly football-wise - Frank, Joe and O. J. — that they cannot imagine not knowing the facts of the Midway and what gets packed in Green Bay, so let's dial away, dial away, dial away through channels where we may find families of fantastic wealth so implausibly evil that they split the seams and stay in the pocket without the slightest trace of guilt."

Splitting seams, staying in pockets. What did those terms betray if not the onset of an alarming condition in this lovely woman? Her brain was being infested by the arcane professor-of-football jargon pouring out the tube.

I felt my own brain, normally the sturdiest of instruments, starting to revise "The Road to Mandalay. and suddenly I was singing: By the old arcane Frank O. Joe. Lookin' northward to Green Bay. There's a monster of the Midway.

And a packer packin' hay. "Pull yourself together," said the woman, pressing hot towels to my forehead. "You know very well that, whatever they pack in Green Bay, it can't be hay, because if it was hay they wouldn't be called the Green Bay Packers, they'd be called the Green Bay Hayseeds."

We were both losing touch with real things. The pictures on the tube were the same pictures that had been on the tube many years ago when I used to watch football five or six times a year.

Incredible forward passes were being incredibly caught at the incredible last instant. Tons of heavily armored flesh thrashed about in what looked like blind confusion but doubtless seemed purposeful to the authorities. Now and then someone writhed in pain or threw the pigskin to earth in violent exultation before leaping into the air to be hugged and kissed by comrades.

"We don't say 'pigskin' any-more." Frank, Joe and O. J. said. "That's as out of date as calling the team 'the eleven.'

Frank, Joe, O. J.! Remember when the Bears were 'the monsters of the Midway? Where or what is the Midway? Is that a field where they used to play? Back when teams were 'elevens' and the game was a 'fray'?' "Today" said Frank, Joe and O. J., "we don't say 'monsters of the Midway.' No way. O.K.?"

Not entirely, my good but aging jocks so glib with split seams and little post patterns and busted pockets that you would probably like to meet my old calculus professor who also enjoyed making me feel like a dunce. Not entirely O.K. till you say, with your learned authority in triple array, what it is, what it is that they pack in Green

"Now back to the game," said Frank, Joe and O. J., leaving me at the mercy of a woman in search of implausibly dull soan opera. Howard Cosell, where are you?

Solzhenitsyn and Anti-Semitism: A New Debate

By Richard Grenier

New York Times Service
EW YORK — The expanded version of Alexander I. Solzhenitsyn's "August 1914" -- containing a new section on the assessination of a Russian prime minister by an anarchist Jew --- has touched off a controversy as to whether the Nobel Prize winner and author of the "Gulag Archipelago" is anti-Semitic. The book is available in French and Russian and is to be published in English next year.

As the man responsible for almost single-handedly informing the West of the horrors of the Soviet Gulag, Solzhenitsyn has long been the object of Soviet efforts to destroy his reputation. But the accusations of anti-Semitism come from such anti-Communist sources as Professor Richard Pipes of Harvard, a Soviet specialist and former director of Eastern European and Soviet Affairs on President Ronald Reagan's National Security Council.

At a Washington conference of the World Congress for Soviet and East European Studies last week, Vladislav Krasnov, a former editor of Radio Moscow's broadcasting division who is now a professor of Russian studies at the Monterey Institute of International Studies in California, called the charge "completely groundless. Solzhenitsyn, who since his arrival in the United States has tended to remain aloof from such disputes, denounced anti-Semitism, calling the charges against him

Not that Solzhenitsyn has lacked defenders. Elie Wiesel, chronicler of the Holocaust and a professor of the humanities at Boston University, is one of his supporters, asserting that Solzhenitsyn is an "au-

Mstislav Rostropovich, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington, in whose home Solzhenitsyn lived for a time in the Soviet Union, said he would swears that the author was no anti-Semite. Professor Adam Ulam of Harvard, another Soviet specialist, said Pipes's characterization of Solzhenitsyn was "very unfair." while Robert Conquest, author of "The Great Terror," called the charge of anti-Semitism "ludicrous."

When Solzhenitsyn's expanded version of "August 1914" appeared in French almost two years ago, no charge of anti-Semitism was raised. The controversy broke into the U.S. press this year in connection with a separate dispute: whether it was prudent to broadcast over the Russian-language service of the U.S. government-financed Radio Liberty a talk by Lev Lossev, a Russian Jew, discussing the possibility of anti-Semitism in the works of Solzhenitsyn. In his broadcast, Lossev expressed clearly his conviction that Solzhenitsyn was not anti-Semitic. But in presenting the adversary view, as a kind of devil's advocate, he used such words as "snake and "degenerate" to describe the Jewish assassin portrayed in "August 1914" (words not used by Solzhenitsyn in the book), and it was thought that such terms beamed in Russian into the Soviet Union might be misinterpreted.

Charges of anti-Semitism against the author are not new; they began appearing in the Russian émigré press and in specialized and Jewish journals as long ago as 1972. In 1977, in Midstream, a publication of the Theodor Herzl Foundation, a Jewish scientist named Mark Perakh said he felt a disproportionately large number of unattractive Jews appeared in Solzhenitsyn's

Another charge, which goes back more than a decade, is that Jews would be second-class citizens in Solzhenitsyn's ideal Russia, a charge that Solzhenitsyn's friends have rebutted by quoting the work on which the charge is based, his "Letter to the Soviet Leaders," published in 1974, the year he was expelled from the Soviet Union. The expanded version of "August 1914," containing the new section on the 1911 assassination of Prime Minister Peter Stolypin of Russia by Dmitri Bogrov, has given new amplitude to the debate. This assassination is considered a turning point in Russian history by Solzhenitsyn and other scholars. They believe that Stolypin was the last liberal, dynamic Russian leader (and benefactor of the Jews) who might have "saved" Russia from Bolshevism.

Pipes said: "Solzhenitsyn looks into Bogrov's mind as he is preparing to assassinate Stolypin. Stolypin is reviving Russia; therefore, it's bad for the Jews. He assassinates him, acting entirely in his capacity as a Jew. But the historical Bogrov was a Jewish renegade, not acting as a Jew at all.

"Every culture has its own brand of anti-Semitism. In Solzhenitsyn's case, it's not racial. It has nothing to do with blood. He's certainly not a racist; the question is fundamentally religious and cultural. He bears some resemblance to Dostoyevsky, who was a fervent Christian and patriot and a rabid anti-Semite. Solzhenitsyn is unquestionably in the grip of the Russian extreme right's view of the revolution, which is that it was the doing of Jews."

In an article last summer in Midstream, Lev Navrozov, a scholar who emigrated from the Soviet Union in 1972 and who now writes for The Yale Literary Magazine, went further than Pipes. Navrozov condemns the Solzhenitsyn novel as "a new Protocols of the Elders of Zion," a reference to the fraudulent document that became a pillar of anti-Semitic propaganda early in this century.

Ulam takes sharp issue with the charges. He acknowledges that the assassination of Stolypin "lends itself" to an anti-Semitic interpretation, but he continues: "On balance, over all, taking into account all his work and his entire biography, I don't think you can call Alexander Solzbenitsyn an anti-Semite. He has a very sharp pen, I admit. He's extremely passionate. He has some sharp things to say about Jews. But he has sharp things to say about Russians who are not Jews. The most you might say about Solzhenitsyn is that he resents the intrusion of foreign influences into Russian life. But an anti-Semite? No. When you take his whole work and his whole life into account, you must say that he is not that, although he saw Christianity as "the" anti-Semitic and that he doesn't hate liberalism: He is inconsistent, perhaps, but many great people are inconsistent."

Professor Mikhail Agursky, a Soviet expert at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, was one of several Jewish dissidents in the Soviet Union who defended Solzhenitsyn against charges of anti-Semitism. "He is a strong supporter of Israel and always has been, "said Agursky, "If you support Israel the way Solzhenitsyn does today, you are not an anti-Semire. And I don't think his idea of a Russian state founded on the Russian Orthodox Church means that Jews would not have full rights. How about Israel? Let's call a spade a spade. In Israel, religion is not separate from the state. Solzhemitsyn's Russia would be built on the same principle. Writing in his own defense, Solzhenitsyn said that he was dedicated to the study of history "just as it was," which he feels is necessary in order not to repeat the horrors that humanity perpetrated on itself in the 20th century — all types of revolution-ary and ethnic genocide." His critics, he indicated, have arbitrarily ascribed anti-Seminism to him because in pre-revolutionary Russia, a period dealt with in his most recent books, "a Jewish question existed and was a burning issue. But at that time, hundreds of authors, including Jews, wrote about this, at that time, precisely the omission of mentioning the Jewish question was considered a manifestation of anti-Semitism - and it would be unworthy for an historian of that era to pretend that that question did not exist."

Referring to the cycle of historical novels of which "August 1914" is the first part, the author wrote: "I am developing The Red Wheel, the tragic history - how Russians themselves in folly destroyed both their past and their future - and in my face is flung the base accusation of 'anti-Semitism' (cynically used as a club by some); and a string of false arguments is basely ascribed to me,

"Concerning the label 'anti-Semitism." this word, just as other labels as well, has lost its precise meaning from thoughtless use, and different publicists in different decades understood is differently. If a biased and unjustified attitude toward the Jewish nation is understood by this term then I tell you assuredly: not only is there no - nor could there be - 'anti-Semitism' in my work, nor for that matter in any book worthy of being called literature. To approach a literary work with the measuring-stick of 'anti-Semitism' is vulgar, an under-developed understanding of the nature of a literary work." The expanded version of Solzhenitsyn's "August 1914" is to be prob-lished in 1986 by Farrar, Strans & Giroux

Judge Blocks Lucas Bid To Bar 'Star Wars' Use

A federal judge has turned down a request by George Lucas to halt broadcasts of television commercials using the title of his hit film "Star Wars" to refer to President Ronald Reagan's proposal for a space-based missile defense system. Lucas claimed the 30-second commercials on behalf of the Strategic Defense Initiative infringed on his trademark. Lucas's lawyers wanted federal Judge Gerhand Ge. sell to order that the SDI lobbying group, the Coalition for the Strate. gic Defense Initiative, be required to change the 30-second commercials or be barred from showing them. Gesell refused to bar their broadcasts, due to begin this week at about 30 U.S. stations, but said he would hold another hearing on the request Nov. 25.
